The annual meeting of the friends of the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics was preceded by a breakfast, at which the Rev. Hugh M'Neile delivered a powerful address. He dwelt upon the state of public feeling towards the Church of England, as viewed under four aspects—dogmatic, devotional, æsthetic, and Protestant—and urged that the position of the Church of England in her Protestant aspect should never have been allowed to decline. "Even," said he "where there are no Roman Catholics the testimony against Romanism should have been maintained; and I remember many years ago, when a young man, being called to a place in Buckinghamshire, where I heard to my great surprise—because there were no Roman Catholics in the district—an admirable, closely-digested sermon against the doctrine of purgatory, in the midst of a Protestant population; and when I was afterwards introduced to the old clergyman and asked him why he had preached such a sermon, his answer was, 'Why, Sir, Popery is in human nature.'" The public meeting was presided over by Mr. J. C. Colquhoun. The report showed a falling off in the income, as compared with the previous year, of between 4,000*l.* and 5,000*l.* The diminution in the receipts was ascribed (in measure at least) to the increasing prevalence of "those new views on religion which treat all creeds as indifferent, consider faith in the Bible as Bibliolatry, and denounce as bigotry attachment to the Protestant faith," or "to the spread of opinions which repudiate the name of Protestant;" which conceal or forget the protest made by our Reformers against Romish error, and seek to unite the Church of England in sympathy, if not in communion, with the Church of Rome. In reviewing the operations of the society, the committee stated that during the year former missions had been maintained and new ground had been broken. The Scripture-readers, consisting mainly of converts, are generally looked upon by the Roman Catholics in the neighbourhood of the missions as their friends. Many a kind office in proof of friendship is rendered to them, and many

the growth of ignorance and immorality, and against the dangers of Romanism, and as a bond of union between England and Ireland. The other speakers were the Bishops of Ripon and Carlisle, Mr. Long, M.P., the Rev. H. Eade, and the Rev. Dr. Collins.

The Congregational Home Missionary Society reported having employed, during the year, 116 mission pastors and 65 lay evangelists, in different English towns and villages. As one result of their labours, 850 persons were enrolled, during the year, as church members. The society conducts its operations through country associations, and on the principle of helping the people to help themselves. A special fund which added to the society's income 3,500*l.* a-year, for three years, being now exhausted, an appeal was made for additional contributions. This was further enforced by the chairman, Mr. Samuel Morley, who remarked upon the state of things of which they had to tell—a terrible, deep reality—as to the extent to which the population was living outside of Christian effort, utterly regardless of Christian obligations and the Christian faith. He said deliberately he did not know which was the more appalling fact of the two, the tremendously-neglected condition of the population, or the apathy of the Church in reference to it. The most heathen part of England was London; if all the people in London who ought to be attending public worship were willing to go they would want 600,000 more sittings, taking the necessary provision as for 58 per cent: yet half the of teachers in existing schools. Reference was next made to panoramas and other exhibitions illustrative of Scripture history, as a valuable means of instructing the young, and drawing them into the schools. Another means was the encouragement of lending libraries in connexion with the schools. These are granted by the committee at one-third of the retail prices, and during the year no fewer than 478 such libraries were applied for, being 141 more than in the previous year.

The returns showed an increase upon last year of nine schools connected with the London auxiliaries, containing 382 teachers and 5,726 scholars. The chairman said the mention of New York in the report had carried his mind across the Atlantic to that great country which now was bowed beneath the weight of heavy calamity. He thought that there should be no meeting of Englishmen and Englishwomen without an endeavour being made to elicit an expression of sympathy with the American people under the fearful bereavement which they had suffered in having their chief and honoured magistrate struck down by the hand of the assassin.
After some other remarks on this theme, and which were loudly applauded, he went on to express his conviction that the Sunday-school was one of the best means which had been found for instructing and leavening the youth of this country, contrasting, at the same time, the means of education now with those open twenty years since, and to urge the need there was for the principle of Sunday-schools being extended. The Rev. A. McMillan moved the adoption of the report. The Rev. Dr.
Edmond seconded the motion in a long but lively speech. In speaking of the spread of the English Sunday-school principle upon the Continent, he expressed a wish that the principle of the Volunteer movement of England would also spread in those countries, as then there would be no more wars. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Revs. S.
Chester, Newman Hall, and J. Reed.

Earl Russell presided at the meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, which celebrated its sixtieth anniversary. The report stated that the demand for teachers continued great. In the practising schools at the Borough-road, and at Stockwell, more than 1,200 children were in daily attendance.
Forty new schools had been opened in the year, and the schools had been placed under

a very good one. It was that the State, having done a certain amount of work, and having given a certain amount of assistance in the promotion of education, felt disposed to say that it was the duty of the people of this country, who had done so much in so many ways for the improvement of society, to make greater efforts than they had hitherto done, and to take upon their own shoulders the greater part of the burden of the education of the people. It was impossible to go into any county in this country and not see that there were parishes in which the means of education were lamentably deficient. That being so, he trusted that education would be extended. But they must always insist upon two points as characteristics of the society—the one that the education to be given should be scriptural education; the other that, in the words of William Allen, the schools should be for all, and not schools confined to any one party, or any particular religious sect. Among the other speakers were Lord Lyveden, Mr. Buxton, M.P., the Rev. Luke Wiseman, Mr. Gurney Hoare, and the Rev. W. Finley.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The sixty-ninth anniversary of the Religious Tract Society was held at Exeter Hall, the Earl of Harrowby in the chair. Dr. Davis, the secretary, read the report, which showed the usual amount of benevolent and world-wide activity. It stated that—

The annual soirée of the Evangelical Alliance took place at Freemasons' Hall, and attended, not only by members of that y in London, but by many friends of istian union from the provinces and ign lands. The chair was occupied by Hon. William Ashley. After singing a an, the Rev. Dr. Vaughan read selections a Scripture, and the Rev. Newman Hall red the opening prayer. The sial, moral, and intellectual condition of e converts stood in marked contrast the degradations of heathenism, some of ich he described. The Rev. C. J. Glyn, who has recently visited Italy, spoke of the first Bible Society meeting held at Naples last October. He took an encouraging view of the changes to be hoped for in that country from the present free circulation of the Word of God. Mr. Ashley having been compelled to leave during the addresses, Mr. A. N. Shaw succeeded to the chair. Mr. Macfie, of Liverpool, also took part in the proceedings.

The annual breakfast of the Protestant Alliance took place at St. James's Hall. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided. The report reviewed the proceedings of the Alliance in relation to a number of important questions in Parliament, in public offices, in parochial affairs, in the churches, and in private life. Numerous lectures had been delivered during the year, and the circulation of the society's publication had been greatly increased. The ordinary income showed an increase over the preceding years. The noble chairman impressed upon the meeting the necessity of caution in conducting their warfare against Rome. "Let them relax none of their principles, but let them be earnest in action and more and more determined to watch every opportunity of pressing forward in the good work. Let them give no rest, night or day, to the great enemy before them. But their efforts must be carried on with the greatest circumspection, and with more than ordinary caution at the present time, inasmuch as, he was sorry to say, there was a great spirit of indifference spreading over the country."

The Rev. Dr. Cumming expressed his deep interest in the Alliance, gave some advice as to the spirit in which controversy should be conducted, and commented upon the present position and aspect of Romanism in this country. The Bishop of Huron described the proselytising efforts of Popish priests and nuns in Canada, the arts by which they prepared the way for sapping the principles of the young belonging to Protestant families, and remarked that he saw the same process going on in this country:—

The young were being educated through the eye by the sight of objects which in his younger days would have been regarded as odious and horrible. In the churches were to be seen the Madonna, the Infant Jesus, crucifixes, and crosses, adorned with flowers, or set off in some other way. Young people at first looked on these objects without consideration, but they gradually became accustomed to them. When in Ireland he regarded these things with horror, and did so still. The other day he met a lady with seven crosses on her person. Were they worn for ornament? He would give the lady credit for more taste. He remembered the day when, if a lady had appeared amongst a Protestant population in Ireland with such decorations, she

It had, among other efforts, sustained the Clerkenwell Working Men's Union in their discussion with the Sunday League, and had sought to protect the sanctity of the Lord's-day, on various occasions, by endeavouring to influence—and in some cases with success—railway managers, members of Parliament, and the Government. It was stated that the increase of cabs last year in London was 297, of which 60 were seven-day cabs, for hire every day; while 237 were six-day cabs, always resting on Sundays. In all, out of a total of 5,947, there were 2,183 cabs which do not ply on the Lord's-day. This was the growth of about ten years. The improvement in the character and habits of the London cabmen was marked. The report concluded with a recommendation to the friends of the cause to take advantage of the approaching general election to obtain from candidates distinct pledges for the protection of the day of rest. After speeches from Captain Fishbourne and the Rev. Aubrey Price, the meeting was addressed by two working men, one of whom, a navvy, assured the audience that, as a body, the class of men to which he belonged were not at all disposed to work on Sunday. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. G. Calthrop, J. D. Brocklehurst, Mr. T. B. Smithies, and Mr. Maxwell.

the Church in accordance with these recommendations. He stated that he had the authority of Sir George Grey for announcing that the leave would be given, and further that the Government had consented that their own measure for making these alterations in Parliament would proceed pari passu with Convocation. He then went on to explain that the whole body of Commissioners, drawn from all the various sections of the Church, were unanimous in recommending these alterations for the quieting of tender consciences, while not one of them would be found to take away a single safeguard from the purity and integrity of the doctrines of the Church. Several bishops spoke to the same effect; the Bishop of Llandaff wishing that the Commission had gone a little farther, and altered that portion of the Oath of Supremacy which affirms that no foreign prelate or potentate hath or ought to have jurisdiction in England. Many persons scrupled to declare that the Pope had no jurisdiction—they were quite ready to affirm he ought to have none—in the face of the facts they now saw around them. The motion of the Archbishop was then agreed to, and sent down to the Lower House for their concurrence.

In the Lower House the debate was more protracted, though the general features and the final result were the same. Archdeacon Denison did not see the necessity for any alteration at all, but he would not oppose the unanimous recommendation of so many eminent members of the Church as were on Amendments were proposed by members, and all in their turn rejected. The suggestion contained in the self put and lost, on a division of one, so that of all the present the committee, the only fruit of the opinion of the Lower House. The constitution of the Court is unsatisfactory.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

By an unusual coincidence the Courts of the three leading Churches of Scotland met at the same time last month.

he chair, was characterised by a strong attack upon the Establishment. That Church, he said, could now only regulate its proceedings by act of Parliament, and had sold Christ for pelf; while the Free Church, having parted with all for the honour of Christ, now possessed larger funds from the free-will offerings of the people than all the resources of the Establishment.

Among the subjects discussed in the United Presbyterian Synod was the condition of the churches connected with their denomination recently planted in London. The report presented under this head was a gratifying one. The aid awarded to them, in the first instance, out of the Synod funds, was no longer needed; all the churches planted in the metropolis had become not only self-supporting, but largely contributed to help in the work of the Gospel in other quarters. The Synod agreed to record their gratitude to God for His blessing, so remarkably vouchsafed on this enterprise; and it was also agreed that the Moderator should address a letter to Mr. Henderson, of Park, whose founding liberality had so much contributed to the first commencement of the work that is now being crowned with such signal success. The great subject of discussion in the two established bodies was the projected union between them. Our readers are aware that in the last two years a joint committee, composed of the most eminent men of both churches, has been sitting for the purpose of fixing terms of union. The reports of this committee were given in to their respective constituents, which led to interesting debates; and in both cases the committees were re-appointed, with powers to continue their sittings. A step towards the contemplated union, perhaps as decided as any other, was taken on the evening of Friday, the 19th, when both the courts suspended their business meetings, and met together in the Free Assembly Hall for intercommunion and mutual devotion. The chair was taken in the early part of the evening by the Moderator of the United Presbyterian body, when, after devotional exercises, an address on the state of religion at home was delivered by Professor Cairns, ex-Moderator of the Free Church. When the chair was vacated by Mr. Marshall it was occupied by the Rev. Dr. Begg, who appeared in his full canonicals of cloak and bands as Moderator of the Free Church. Devotional exercises were again engaged in, at which the Rev. Dr. Cairns, of Berwick, in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. Dr. Begg, ex-Moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, delivered an address on the state of religion abroad. The concluding remarks of Dr. Cairns's address are worth perusal:—

Fathers and brethren, let me, ere I close, advert to the influence for good which the proceedings of churches in this country, when they are in harmony with the mind of Christ, and more especially when they rise to the grandeur of epoch-making events, exert on the churches of the Continent. Such an event was the disruption and the foundation of the Free Church of Scotland. There was here a testimony for religious conviction; there was here a testimony for religious liberty, which has made its echo felt all over the Continent; and now if God shall lead you and lead us, renewing and upholding all our past testimonies as churches for truth and liberty to add a new and crowning testimony for Christian brotherhood and charity, and shall reserve for us a union dictated by no decrees or edicts of kings and cabinets, enforced by no submission to infallible authority, but growing naturally, growing spontaneously, growing irresistibly out of the attractions of Christian hearts towards each other, who shall measure the influence of such a demonstration on the whole Protestantism of the Continent, on the whole Romanism of the Continent, on that whole long and wavering line of battle from the one end of Europe to the other, on which hang the issues of the future day! O may He guide us in a work so arduous and so momentous, that no such opportunity as we now have, and for which we must account at His bar, be neglected or misimproved, that nothing be done amiss, that nothing be either precipitated or unduly delayed, but that now with one heart, and, if it be His blessed will, ere long with one voice, we may in our own land, and on the Continent, and to the ends of the earth, glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

Two days last month were devoted by the Congregational Union of England and Wales to their spring meeting. The proceedings took place in the Weigh-house Chapel, and were presided over by the Rev. D. Thomas, of Bristol, the chairman for the year. As is usual on these occasions, the chairman's address was one of the leading features of the first day's sitting. The topic was, "The relation of our ministry in its public exercises to the standard of Christian life commonly attained among us." It was most faithful in its criticisms and counsels, thoughtful and practical in its suggestions, and devout in its tone. Drawing attention, as it did, to the present low state of piety which generally prevails, and to the frequent absence which is so commonly met of all earnest desire and endeavour after a truer and nobler life,—to the connexion of this state of things with the ministrations of the pulpit, and to the means by which it may be remedied, so far as it depends upon the pastor,—it was felt to be most appropriate and useful, and produced a very salutary impression. The principle item of business was an

President Lincoln, and its deepest abhorrence of the crime that compassed it; and would take the earliest opportunity of expressing its earnest desire for the future peace and well-being of the American people, identified as they are with the British nation in origin, language, literature, and those benevolent activities by which the world may be elevated and redeemed.

Dr. Halley, Principal of New College, with deep emotion, and amid the applause of the assembly, expressed his hope that some words more expressive of the earnest admiration the assembly felt for the character of the late President would be inserted in the resolution. He decidedly objected to the resolution as it then stood. A scene of great excitement ensued; but the mover of the resolution and others having expressed their concurrence, the Rev. Newman Hall having also spoken, the resolution was sent back to a sub-committee, who shortly afterwards presented it in an amended form to the assembly, the following words being inserted: "The assembly records its admiration of the uprightness, magnanimity, and gentleness which the late President manifested in the discharge of the great and perilous duties to which he was called."

The meeting was then addressed by Dr. Cleveland, Dr. Storrs, and Mr. Levi Coffin. Dr. Cleveland (who said he brought to the assembly the Christian salutations of 2,744 Congregational churches in America) in the course of his speech referred to the expressions of public sympathy with the American people under their late calamitous loss, and especially the Queen's letter to Mrs. Lincoln

INDIA.

The Bishop of London, in addressing the Church Missionary Society at its recent anniversary, referred to an important article by the Bishop of Calcutta, upon the Tinnevely missions, written after they had been personally visited by his lordship as metropolitan. The whole article, which appears in the May number of the Church Missionary Intelligencer, will well repay perusal. We give one extract, referring to the moral and spiritual results of his work. To the question, Are these southern Christians clearly and decidedly superior in morality to their heathen neighbours? he thus replies:—

It is almost sufficient to say that these Shanars, and other converts of the south, were idolaters, but are now Protestant Christians; that they did worship at pei korila, but do worship in churches; and that they were left in absolute ignorance of things human and Divine like, till the missionaries came with their schools, and sermons, and Bible-classes. So vast an outward change necessarily involves something of an inward change; they could not have been persuaded to prefer the peaceful simplicity of the Christian hymn to the frantic orgies of the devil-worship without a thorough alteration of their tastes and feelings; and, in truth, the visible and tangible results of the change are anything but insignificant. The civilising influence of Christianity is shown in the neatness and order which mark the Christian villages, in the cleanliness of the Christian compared with the dirt and untidiness of the heathen Shanars, in the social elevation of the women, the happiness and purity of domestic life, the open and intelligent countenances of the children in the mission schools. It is not shown in any diminution of drunkenness, for happily not hindrance to Christian work does not exist among the Shanar; and it is a remarkable fact that, though their palmyras furnish them with an unfailing supply of intoxicating drink, they have never formed any taste for it. But it is shown very remarkably in the liberality of the converts. The sums which they contribute to religious and benevolent objects, and the interest which they take in them, may well put to shame the nominal Christianity of too many among our own countrymen. These poor agricultural labourers have their church-building societies, missionary societies, societies for the relief of Christians in distress, tract, book, and Bible societies. Their charitable funds are managed at a Dharmmasangam—a public meeting duly convened for the purpose of voting grants for good objects; and Dr. Caldwell relates, as an illustration of the interest taken in such works of benevolence, that on one occasion, when he asked why no women from a certain village were present at a sangam, he was told that the river was swollen, so that the women had turned back, but the men had swum. He adds that the village was eleven miles off, so that, for a purely disinterested purpose, they took a walk of twenty-two miles in one day, and twice encountered "perils of waters" in swimming a swollen Indian river.

CEYLON.

A great public discussion has recently been held between the missionaries and the Jadhists at Baddagama, for which preparations had been some time in progress. The Rev. Parsons, of the Church Missionary Society, after stating that the debate commenced on 8th, and lasted till the 13th, says :—

We met every day (except Sunday) from one o'clock till six. Our side numbered about 150 Christians, including some of our Wesleyan neighbours, who gladly joined. On their side were fifty priests and more than 1,000 Buddhists. In this vast assembly were the fathers and elders of many of our dear Christian people. Among their priests they had the great controversialists, one of whom had been brought from Colombo. Our expectations, therefore, were fully realised, and the controversy became a general struggle between Christianity and Buddhism, in which the whole of the Singhalese race must feel interested. It was arranged that five papers should be read by each party. We allowed them to bring forward the first paper. This contained charges of inconsistency in the statements of the Bible, with reference to the attributes of Jehovah. It was answered; and a similar attack made by us on Buddhism. They answered this in a very satisfactory way, and the battle was from that time in our favour. In their second charge they brought forward a large number of quotations from the Bible, endeavouring to prove that its statements are inconsistent and undeserving of credit. These were all answered, and the answers picked up by Mr. de Silva, of the Wesleyan Mission, in a noble defence of the truth, the effect of which was withering to the Buddhist side. Our defence was read out on Saturday evening, and on Monday they instantly proposed to carry on the controversy on a new plan, their object being, without doubt, to stop the controversy. The whole day was spent in resisting their proposal, and in attesting the copies of our defence. The headman of our district, fearing a breach of the peace, from the excited state the Buddhists had been in since the reading of our second defence, had officially informed the Government. On Monday evening, therefore, the public controversy was abruptly ended by the appearance of two Government officials, who requested us to cease forthwith from publicly meeting together. Arrangements were therefore made for continuing the controversy by correspondence.

The English Presbyterian missionaries report that bitter persecution of their converts taken place at Yam Chau, in the Tie-Chew district. Christian men and women have of these painful facts, that so lately as last month a communication was

FOREIGN.

THE political condition of France is now so quiet, that the Emperor has a tour of inspection through the province of Algeria, where he has been colonists and by the native population with that warm and demonstrative is so suggestive of the expectation of future benefits. Both these classes complain of, and both hope that, now the Emperor has come in person own eyes, their grievances will be redressed. But up to this time the changes; he contents himself with observing, though it may be the of many things, and marks down points for future reform. The whole France has been employed during his absence in celebrating the worship we may as well call them—of the Virgin Mary, to whose honor of May is dedicated as one long festival; and during the time, as our the worship of Almighty God is thrown into the background. Their their religious anniversaries as well as we at home; the Pastoral appear to have excited the greatest interest. It is heart-rending to find ernment. It is the natural sequence of the inextricable way in which the Church is wound up in the cause of civil government all over Germany, and which extends even to the German pale into the Scandinavian nations. In Sweden, for instance, a shocking amount of persecution and injustice has been done, to which we are anxious to give the more prominence as the victims are Roman Catholics. It appears that seven married women were used there to forsake the Lutheran religion and to become Roman Catholics, for which they were tried by the laws of the State and sentenced to banishment. This, of course, was an act of the State. But as if emulous of a share in the infamy, the authorities in the Catholic Church have, at the instance of the husbands of these women, declared that the banishment annuls the marriages, decreed a divorce, and authorised the husbands to marry again. The indignant reprobation of all Protestantism must, we are sure, be concentrated on the authors of this frightful injustice and immorality.

Scarcely had our last number gone to press than the public mind of England, and, indeed, of all Europe, was horrified with the news from America that President Lincoln had been slain by the hand of an assassin. The life of Mr. Secretary Seward was also attempted, and one of his sons and a servant were shockingly wounded, but happily, they are all of them yet to survive. The assailant of the President had done his work more surely. An actor named John Wilkes Booth, of whom it is charitable to suppose that he was half mad, came behind the rear of the box where the President, with his wife, was sitting at the play, and shot him with a pistol in the back of the head. He then leaped from the box upon the stage, and got clear away. He was tracked, however, and was afterwards shot in the attempt to capture him. The President lingered for some hours, but was quite insensible, and died on the morning following. Several other persons are now in custody on the charge of being implicated in the crime. The mingled emotions which it has called forth among our American readers is well depicted in the letter from our New York correspondent.

H O M E.

May is the time when the Christian Church gives her answer to the various attacks which come throughout the year on her character and work in the world. Her enemies have the advantage of choosing the time and manner of their attacks, and they generally take advantage of that all the world shall know of the vigour of these assaults and their assured chance of success. The Church, on the other hand, for the most part goes quietly on her way, absorbed in her self-chosen mission of relieving distress, assuaging sorrow, instructing the ignorant, and elevating and purifying society; and it is only on her annual gatherings, when she comes to review her labours and to consider the extent of her moral and material resources for the work which lies before her, that one can fairly estimate the effect of the attacks on her constitution or the extent of the damage she has sustained. Such an opportunity was offered in the May missionary meetings, after a year of assaults organised with uncommon vigour, and characterised by an outspoken boldness such as we have not witnessed for many a day. The result has been to show that the Church and the Church's work is more deeply rooted than ever in the affections of the people. The varied and numerous attempts to sow distrust and disaffection in the minds of the religious public have received their answer in richer contributions, more quickened interest, and a more determined determination to maintain and to extend the cause of missions, than was at any former time manifested. There could be no mistake about the feeling of the assemblies gathered round our different societies. There was not one of them which had any lingering tale of success to tell, no great discovery made, no honoured veteran, whose services had made his name familiar among us as a household word, had returned from the mission. The year was an ordinary one in every respect save this—that missions had been acknowledged and the reality of missionary conversion denied. And the increased attendance at missionary meetings and the increased contributions to the missionary funds showed the fact that the English people attached to these malignant tales.

Among the quarters where the work of Christian missions has been assailed, the meeting of a body calling itself the Anthropological Society has obtained a bad eminence. Not all the attacks, but the worst of them, have come, and we are in duty bound to add that thence also has come one of the ablest, most thoughtful, and most complete answers to those attacks, from a simple narrative of the well-authenticated facts of the case. A Mr. Winwood Reade read a paper on African missions at the society, the contents of which may be judged from one sweeping statement, that of all the African converts whom the writer had met, the men were invariably thieves, and the women prostitutes. Mr. Burton, the well-known African traveller, followed this up with the results of his own experience that Mohammedanism was much better adapted for the native African mind than Christianity. On the other hand, Mr. Burnard Owen read a paper giving a luminous view of all that had been accomplished for the elevation of the African races, to which it is fair to say the whole meeting listened with marked attention. Bishop Colenso also gave his views on the subject in a lengthened document. He is for missions, but for missions conducted on a plan peculiarly his own. All former efforts have been conducted on a narrow and a bigoted basis, and he did not wonder that the Africans preferred their own superstitions to the kind of Christianity which was presented to their view by orthodox missionaries. His own plan appears to be a benevolent sort of Deism. He dwelt much on the love and goodness of God, as manifested to the world at large, and of which the African had a right to his share; but there was little or nothing said of that Mediator through whom God's love was manifested to the world. It was, in fact, a system of Christianity from which Christ was carefully eliminated. Dr. Colenso may be willing to go forth as a missionary of this new gospel, but we suspect the society which is to support him has yet to be formed.

The successor to Cardinal Wiseman in the Romish See of Westminster has been appointed. To the astonishment of Romanist and Protestant alike, the choice has fallen on Dr. Manning; and the fortunate pervert will be formally installed in his office within a short period. This appointment is the more surprising as it was generally understood that the dignity was destined for another, and as Dr. Manning, so it is said, has continued, during the few years that he has been a Roman Catholic, to render himself specially obnoxious to the hereditary members of his adopted creed. Nor will the secret history of the intrigues that led to his nomination, as these are now generally understood, tend to reconcile them. It is said that there has been a struggle going on for some time past between what may be called the Episcopal as against the Papal principle in the Romish Church—the struggle, that is to say, whether a see shall be filled up at the recommendation of the caputular body, or at the sole will and pleasure of the Pope himself; and in this appointment of Dr. Manning the new principle has triumphed. Soon after the appointment of Cardinal Wiseman himself to the see, it appears that Dr. Errington was appointed as his coadjutor, with the right, as fully secured as such a right could be, to succeed him. But it was not long before differences of opinion arose between the Cardinal and his coadjutor on points arising from their different views as to the rights of the inferior clergy. Appeal was made to Rome, and the Pope not only gave the decision in the Cardinal's favour, but removed Dr. Errington from his coadjutorship, quashing his right to succeed to the archbishopric. Against this the other bishops have never ceased to protest in private, for they felt that if the Pope could depose a bishop in reversion, he could also depose a bishop in actual possession. Accordingly, at the Cardinal's death, the Chapter, according to usage, returned three names to the Pope, placing Dr. Errington's name at the head of the list; while the other two, Dr. Clifford and Dr. Grant, wrote to his Holiness, earnestly intreating that he would quiet the excitement stirred up by the removal of Dr. Errington, by now nominating him anew to the archbishopric. It is said the Pope was exceedingly annoyed with these remonstrances, and to mark his displeasure, he set aside all three in favour of Dr. Manning, who is an Ultramontane, or a Pope-worshipper to his heart's content. And doubtless in the new Archbishop English Protestantism will have a powerful and subtle as well as a bitter enemy to encounter.

Among the signs of the approaching dissolution of Parliament, perhaps the most interesting is the excitement raised in the University of Oxford to determine whether or not Mr. Gladstone shall continue to be one of the representatives for that learned body. The opposition now organised against him is more formidable than on any former occasion. The opponent selected to contest the University against him is Mr. Gathorne Hardy, whose scholarly accomplishments and statesmanlike reputation are only inferior to Mr. Gladstone's own, while his political career is much more in accordance with the traditional idea of Oxford opinions. Mr. Gladstone's late speeches in favour of a wide-extended suffrage, and against the Irish Church Establishment, together with his general support of measures demanded by Dissenters, have alienated from him many of his old admirers; but his personal friends cling to him more warmly than ever; and a heterogeneous band—made up of Tractarians and Rationalists in religion, Dr. Pusey acting along with Professor Jowett, and Tories and Radicals in politics, Sir John Coleridge and Mr. Goldwin Smith coalescing—are banded together in his support.

such men as Newman and Manning, that Popery is rapidly progressing of weight. These are not presumptuous or silly vaunters; Dr. Newman is not likely to be carried away by boyish exaggerations of hopes and opportunities superior to those of Protestants for surveying the extent of propagandism in this country; and the satisfaction, tranquil and untroubled, with the progress of Rome in England, is a circumstance on which no intelligent Protestant would look with indifference.

In the next place, it is undeniable that recent accessions to the Church of England have, in a large proportion, been of eminent, remarkable, and distinguished men, or of persons belonging to the aristocracy. The difficulty in England when the upper classes can set the fashion of the nation is to dictate a faith to the people; but the influence of aristocracy is so great that we conclude that every person of distinguished rank who has joined the Church has carried over a more or less considerable circle of dependents. Lists have been published of the titled personages who, within the last century, have renounced Protestantism, and after every sustainable deduction from the number, they continue in a high degree formidable. It is hardly to be supposed that there is no great Protestant house in which there is not one descendant who has been converted. Still more important is it that the aristocracy of talent should, in the last century, have transferred their allegiance to Rome. At what period since could the Church of Rome boast of two such English converts as Dr. Manning and Dr. Newman? The one is superlatively adapted to influence minds of order and of strong religious feelings: the other has exactly the power which combines best with the more showy gifts of eloquence to affect the popular mind. If to Dr. Manning and Dr. Newman, we add Sir George Bowyer and Sir John Simeon, in the last century, we take the four as not unfairly representing the additions which have been made within the last quarter of a century to the Romish communion. What men of equal or nearly equal calibre can we point to as recruits to the Church from Rome? Nay, can we deny that men like these tower which carried off Manning and Newman, and which, if it does not embrace luminaries like these, may lead away even a larger number of the average clergy than the famed Tractarian revolt—that the nature and extent of the danger are perceived. It is an unquestionable fact that ministers of the Church of England go at this moment to greater lengths in the way of assimilation to Romish practices than the old leaders of Tractarianism thought of. The Bishop of Exeter was formerly looked upon as a ringleader in the sect of Romanisers. It conveys a startling impression of the development of Popery in the Church of England to hear that it has alarmed Bishop Phillpotts. Lord Ebury stated in the House of Lords, on the 16th of June, that the Bishop of Exeter had refused to consecrate a church in Torquay because of its Romish ornamentation and the tendency of the practices of the clergy to lead men over to Rome. The Marquis of Westmeath, on the same occasion, detailed a state of affairs to which the doings of the original Tractarians were but child's play. He had himself attended the church of St. Matthias, at Stoke Newington, on Whit-Sunday, and he told their lordships what he had seen there. All he could hear of the morning service and of the Psalms was intoned unintelligibly to the Gregorian music. At the end of the morning service there was a long pause, during which the bell tolled. A youth then came forward with a lighted taper, made a low bow at one extremity of the table, lit a candle, and then ceremoniously went round to the other end of the table, made an obeisance, and lit another candle. The table seemed to be covered with a crimson embroidered table-cloth, upon which stood a large black cross on a black ground, and several vases of flowers were on the table. The two clergymen who read the lessons and the morning prayers had a red strap over their shoulders, with apparently a brass cross at the end. The two clergymen, with a younger one and the choristers, now assembled at one side of the chancel, and commenced marching in procession down the centre of the church, while they at the same time sung a hymn. In the centre of the procession was a man bearing a large brass cross, elevated. The three priests were dressed in crimson braided with gold. The procession moved slowly, and with practised steps, down the middle of the church, and back again up the chancel, where each chorister took his place, the three priests meanwhile walking towards the communion-table, where they stood with their backs to the people. Two boys stood within the rails, one with the incense-holder, which he heaved to and fro. The principal priest then turned round, took the incense, caused it to emit volumes of smoke, and, turning towards the table, threw the incense smoke about in every direction. One of the priests now read the epistle; after which another priest, taking an illuminated book off a desk or stand on the table, gave out the gospel, then turning towards the principal priest, held the book wide open, while clouds of incense arose over it. After intoning and chanting the Communion Service in a way to render it unintelligible, one of the priests went away, and, divesting himself of the outer crimson garment, preached a sermon to the effect that the red dresses symbolised the tongues of fire that fell upon the Apostles, the colour of fire being red. Suitable conclusion to such mummeries!

History seldom repeats itself, but this description of what is seen in London churches in the second half of the nineteenth century irresistibly recalls the doings of Archbishop Laud in the same metropolis in the first half of the seventeenth. Laud's manner of administering the sacrament on the occasion of his consecrating St. Catharine Creed Church, in Leadenhall-street, on the 16th of January, 1631, was as follows: "As he approached the communion table, he made several lowly bowings, and coming up to the side of the table, where the bread and wine were covered, he bowed seven times; and then, after the reading of many prayers, he came near the bread, and gently lifted up a corner of the napkin wherein the bread was laid; and when he beheld the bread, he laid it down again, flew back a step or two, bowed three several times towards it; then he drew near again, and opened the napkin, and bowed as before. Then he laid his hand on the cup, which was full of wine, with a cover upon it; which he let go again, went back, and bowed thrice towards it; then he came near again, and lifting up the cover of the cup, looked into it, and, seeing the wine, let fall the cover again, retired back, and bowed as before. Then he received the sacrament, and gave it to some principal men; after which, many prayers being said, the solemnity of the consecration ended."

We do not find that Laud himself got the length of incense-swinging, nor to that elaborate masking of prayer in music, which renders it unintelligible to ordinary persons, and assimilates it to the Latin praying of the Church of Rome. Nor do we hear that Laud made any additions to the Book of Common Prayer. But our modern Romanisers cannot, by any interpretation or disguise of the Prayer-book, make it sufficiently Romish for their taste. The Marquis of Westmeath stated that in St. Alban's Church, Holborn, a Prayer-book is used which contains hymns, prayers, and litanies not in the Book of Common Prayer—"hymns and prayers in several instances containing doctrines wholly at variance with those of the Church of England, and which were specially protested against by that Church." His lordship added that he had no doubt a large proportion of the hymnals now in use in many churches, including "Hymns, Ancient and Modern," which he understood had a circulation of a million copies, and were said to be in use in several cathedrals and a large number of parish churches, contained doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church insidiously introduced into them. In the St. Alban's book many errors of the Church of Rome were introduced; in point of fact, "it did not require much theological learning to see that Mariolatry, the Invocation of Saints and Angels, Transubstantiation, the Real Presence, and Prayers for the Dead, had all a place in this book." The state of the case was thus briefly but vigorously described by Lord Ebury: "What was it they complained of? They saw in a Church, whose confessors and martyrs suffered to establish it in the utmost purity of doctrine and simplicity of ritual, the following doctrines taught and practices followed: Transubstantiation, in all but the name; auricular confession, penance, priestly absolution, prayers for the dead, ornamental vestments, emblematic banners and processions, crucifixes, incense, candles lighted in broad day, and an exaggerated amount of music in the service."

This, of course, is Romanism, if such a thing as Romanism exists. The essential characteristics of the Romish system of worship—first, that it is a propitiatory performance by the priest for the people, rather than an act of the people themselves; and, secondly, that it is accompanied by every external appliance, of music, gesture, costume, and incense-burning, by which imagination can be influenced and the senses laid under a spell—could hardly be exhibited in higher perfection in Rome itself.

It was declared by the Bishop of London that, much as he and his colleagues on the bench regretted the circumstance, the law enabled them to do little to check or amend these things.

We do not infer from all this that the Church of England is becoming Romish, or that there is any probability of a motion being made in Parliament for the acknowledgment of Papal supremacy by the United Kingdom. But we say that thousands—for on the lowest computation they must be reckoned by thousands—of persons in the Church of England are undergoing a preparation which renders it morally certain that they will sooner or later join the Church of Rome. The fibres of belief and affection by which they are attached to their parent tree are being gradually relaxed, and when a sharp wind blows, they will be carried off like the loose-hanging leaves of autumn. The clerical leaders may have no such intention at present; the

Is of the Tractarian secession were for many years enthusiastic for the Anglican Church; but when it became plain that the Church of England could not be romanised, all those, both among the clergy and the laity, who could not resist the combined force of conscience and of logic, declared for Rome. The Romanisers of the day have put a wider breach between themselves and the Church of England than ever put by the old Tractarians previous to their departure. The Church of the day, now as then, will hear of no compromise, and looks down upon the Church of England as merely one of a number of heretical and rebellious sects. The day, therefore, must come when there will be a new clearing out for Rome, and when an Ecclesiastical Establishment honeycombed with Popery will yield another swarm to the Anglican Church. Nor is this all. What reason is there to hope that this swarm will be the last? In the confessed impotence of the rulers of the Church to combat mischief, what prospect is there that the Church of England will not become—should rather say continue—a Protestant nursery for Romanists? This is to me far the most alarming symptom in the situation. Since the days of Laud the Church of England has prepared a succession of converts for Rome, and the evil has attained portentous magnitude. Of its abatement we see no prospect whatever. Such, then, is the position of affairs in relation to Popery in this country, so far as we are able to survey it. We have confined ourselves strictly to facts, neither endeavouring to heighten their colour nor seeking to enhance their effect. To sum up, it appears that numerous additions have recently been made to the Romish communion in England, and that those additions have consisted in great measure of persons eminent in ability, rank, or social standing; that the Romish leaders are confident of success; that multitudes in the Church of England seem on the verge of going with Rome. We might add that, owing to various causes connected with the actual history of the time and the ecclesiastical divisions of Protestantism, it commonly happens that those who have once become unsettled in their religious belief, find rest in one of the two extremes, Popery and infidelity, and only in rare cases return to a temperate, rational, and Scriptural Protestantism. It is a curious fact that an immense number of minds are at present agitated with religious doubts, and of such minds a rich harvest is being gleaned by Rome. Our space is exhausted. In a second article on the subject we shall state in the same manner the aspects favourable to the vitality and progress of Protestantism in Great Britain, and the facts and arguments of those who persist in regarding all that has happened of the advance of Romanism as the exaggeration of startled bigotry. Meanwhile, we submit that we have shown grounds for believing that the progress of Popery in England is a real and a serious affair, demanding and deserving the earnest prayerful attention of all Protestants. B.

fifty years ago—it was a Sabbath, and the 18th of June—two armies woke up to find themselves facing one another, ten miles to the south of Brussels. It had been a bivouac, and as with soaked garments and stiff limbs the warriors rose from their resting-places amongst the dripping rye, it was an impressive scene which naturally opened to either encampment, and a solemn consciousness which filled the hearts of many. On the one side was the mightiest military genius of modern times—the man who had made the earth to tremble, and who had attached to himself with enthusiastic devotion a whole empire of soldiers. On the other side was the final effort to resist a universal military despotism, and retain for the peoples of the Continent something like individual rights and independent existence. As the red lines could be forced back into the dark forest behind them, the ball or insolent aggression and wanton invasion which had rendered a torment and terror of its neighbours, it must be confessed that it introduced a European millennium. It left Poland dismembered; Austrians in Italy; in restoring their former rulers, it provided France, Naples, and Spain; and in their internal condition it left just as they had been—not much freer, wiser, or more happy: cumbered with the Pope, the Greeks down-trampled by the Turks, the Albanians still infested by Algerine corsairs, the serfs of Muscovy still in American plantations, the British West Indies, the Dutch possessions cultivated by slaves, and both France and her antagonist groaning by debts which threatened to keep them in the dust for ever.

Nor here at home had we much cause for pride. Half the parishes had no parish school; many had no clergyman in actual residence; people grew up ignorant and untaught, every crime was capital. If a man went into a house, he was hanged; so was he if he stole a sheep, or burned a house, or forged a cheque: for a hundred offences the short and simple remedy was death. But although these and many other anomalies long remained, the great victory given to the Allies on the 18th of June was, that it set free the mind. The most effectual restraint on thought is not a censor of the press, or against freedom of speech: the greatest restraint on thought, and, consequently, the most powerful obstacle to progress, is the spell of a fixed idea; and for the first time of a generation the fixed and well-founded idea of Europe was French. It was no longer French armies on the frontier, or a French navy in the offing, to which all improvements were preposterous; and if any philanthropist in England ventured to suggest a change, he was instantly met by this formidable cry: "What is the use of amending the poor-law? where is the sense of that? The enemy may be here to-morrow!" But by the time that danger—by relieving the old world from the constant dread of a new despotism—the victory at Waterloo disengaged the minds of men, and the years have been one long harvest, in which we have been reaping the fruits of free thought and frank discussion. In our own country it has of intellect, for a few pence the labourer can procure luxuries which not long were monopolised by the wealthy; and as over "the cup which cheers but not mingles" he reads his daily paper, and reads the doings of a world in which he has become a living power and actual member, or in the cheap train takes his children to see the wonders of the sea, or visit a palace of art, or a great man's park or picture gallery, he may bless the Lord for living, not only when the ends of the earth touch another, but when in kindly contact rich and poor have come together.

Looking farther afield, since that remarkable day how many changes have come up in Europe? Greece is once more a nation; Italy, too, is a kingdom where there were no serfs in Russia, any more than Algerine corsairs in the Mediterranean. Amongst the Great Powers, the most friendly neighbour of England is France; and for that emancipation has been proclaimed by Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States, it is to be hoped that soon no slavery will be left in the world.

These changes we exult in recounting. Were they mere boons dropped direct from heaven, we should gratefully adore the Giver of all Good; but, none the less gift of God, they are to us still more precious and affecting as an outgrowth from the Gospel. To the equity, to the humanity, to the consideration for others which the corrupted Christianities have been slowly teaching the world, are we indebted for every social and legislative improvement which comes, under the precept, "do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you;" and to the mental elevation which its divine thoughts and magnificent motives supply we may well ascribe those inventions, material and mechanical, in which our age of iron has excelled, and which seem to be preparing still further the way of the Lord.

But the Gospel itself? How fares it with the faith once delivered to the saints? During this half century what has been the progress of real religion in the world?

There have been some changes. Fifty years ago there was little faith in many. The ministers were rationalists, and such heart as was left to the people, amidst the desolations of their country, was given to Goethe: now, if the people to a large extent continue apathetic, the ministers are, for the greater part, earnest believers. Italy and Austria, and other Catholic countries, if not prepared for Protestantism, are ceasing to be Papal, and in the presence of the Bible and actual daylight the Pope and his infallibility are melting away with the other mists of mediævalism. Amongst ourselves changes are in progress. Nearly all the middle classes now take interest in religion, and theology is not confined to the pulpit. Some of our best evangelists are laymen, and—excepting those who seek a sacerdotal seclusion—it is a new atmosphere in which our clergymen are living. The consequence is that the practical element has largely invaded the polemical domain, and, in England especially, a very few propositions constitute the entire "body of divinity"—the remainder being not so much denied as disused: a few hundred texts meeting all the requirements of the popular Evangelical preacher, and any one of the remainder, or none at all, being quite enough for the Broad Churchman. But if the religion of the day is deficient in the Scriptural freshness and out-and-out faith of the Reformation period, and if it falls short of the symmetrical strength and systematic precision of the Puritan period, it is only just to concede to it a cheerful and beneficent activity, which has only once been surpassed. There may have been times when ministers studied more, but never a time when, established and dissenting alike, they laboured so hard. There may have been times when both ministers and private Christians read more, and prayed more, and meditated more, but never a time when so many visits of mercy were paid, so many scholars taught, so many efforts put forth in the way of reclaiming, elevating, and comforting others. And, we may add, there never was a time when so much was given. Last May the religious societies in London announced, as their year's income, more than a million; and most of this is the growth of these fifty years. In 1814 the London Missionary Society had an income of 19,000*l.*; this year it had risen to 91,000*l.* In 1814 the Wesleyan Missionary Society received 9,500*l.*; fifty years thereafter it had mounted to 142,000*l.* In 1814 the Church Missionary Society boasted of 10,788*l.*; like its Wesleyan sister, it has in fifty years increased fifteen-fold, and is now 164,464*l.*

It is God alone who can prevent subsequent times from becoming worse than the present; but in the meanwhile we cannot say that the former times were better than these. Economically, socially, spiritually, they were a great deal worse; and surely we do well to recall the gracious Providence which, relieving Britain from a continual menace, and Europe from a crushing incubus, set free for other than martial purposes the wealth, the energies, the minds of men.

It was God's doing. Like the dispersion of the Spanish Armada, like the opportune arrival of King William, it was an interposition marked and memorable, and amidst our admiration of the valour on either side, there is small room for vain-glorious vaunting. As he marched beneath the beech-trees of Soignies, or rose from his rest on the plashy field, the raw recruit felt for the first time that he was to stand front to front with death; whilst the adverse slope frowned with Old Guards and tried legions familiar with victory. And had some little move been different—had the light field-pieces of previous campaigns not been exchanged for heavier artillery—had a square been broken, or had the panic of the Belgian cavalry spread—had the frail defences of Hougomont yielded, or had the Prussians been a little later of arriving—the story of the world might have bounded back to the days of Roman imperialism, and weary Europe have had to roll the stone up hill once more. But the Lord on high controlled it all. He gave the timely valour; He brought the seasonable succour; He toned the nerves on which freedom hung and supplied the needful skill; and when a few leagues and a single day were all that intervened betwixt Europe and an age of absolutism, He dispelled the danger, and gave the nations an unprecedented blessing—forty years of peace and improvement; an era of busy enterprise and bloodless industry; an age of activity and intelligence; above all, an age of ever-expanding liberty and lofty aspiration. It was He who brake the bow and cut the spear. It was His own right hand and holy arm which gave that victory.

It is with a solemn feeling that one visits that famous field, and thinks of all the possibilities; and if it be a nation's duty to keep God's mighty acts in memory, we do well to recall the day of that great deliverance and enforce on ourselves its lessons.

As the Governor among the nations has made our country powerful, let it be our effort to make it popular and useful. To expatriated Hungarians, Poles, and Italians England has long been an open refuge and a secure asylum, just as to the depressed and exhausted nations of the Peninsula its soldiers and its subsidies were deliverance from a detested invader. But considering the solid services which England has conferred, and which it would be willing to repeat, it may be questioned if we are favourites even with those who are the most indebted to our friendship. If so, the blame must lie with those who represent us abroad. And who are these? Not the noblemen who occupy the British embassies in Petersburg and Paris; in foreign lands the real representatives of England are the newspapers, which penetrate every capital, the tourists whom every summer scatters in swarming myriads along the rivers of Germany and the lakes of Switzerland, and the traders who, summer and winter, are found in every harbour of the world. These are our true plenipotentiaries, who may gain for our country golden opinions wherever they go, or who, ideas involving us in serious embroilments, may convey the impression that we are arrogant and unreasonable, irascible and haughty. We boast of being off-hand and in-spoken; but "plain English" is not always understood by strangers, although, to them justice, they generally understand it better than our French or German. Then, besides the great advantage of being able to understand our neighbours, whether we trade or travel, it is surely right to defer to their usages, where no sin is involved in compliance. If we think it needful to visit a continental cathedral, it is not needful, by way of asserting our Protestantism, to talk whilst the people are at prayers, nor even if we drop a frog into the holy water will it turn them from the way or of their ways. When an Englishman is killed or insulted, it may be necessary to march or bombard a Japanese town, by way of showing how highly we value the lives of our people; but perhaps the Englishman would not have been killed if he had listened to the advice and entreaty of the people themselves; and although we are told that the first war with China was right and requisite, it would have been more comfortable if opium had not been the casus belli. We love our country, and we long to see it loved and honoured throughout the world; but it is not our Legislature, or Government, our Queen, who can make us popular. It is the Englishman abroad who is our most influential representative; and if he be gentle and courteous, kind and self-repressing, grateful for kindness, and considerate of others, he will render to his country an unspeakable service. This is a letter of commendation which all can read and understand; and it would help to gain for England that best conquest, the goodwill of nations, the respect and affection of mankind.

H.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL MISSIONS.

BISHOP COLENSO is the Coriolanus of modern Anglicanism. After fluttering the Zulus in far-off Zulu-land, he has returned to awaken deeper tremors in devoted tender breasts at home. If Sir George Lewis will permit us to believe in the existence of such a hero, the Coriolanus of Shakespeare and "Pinnock's Goldsmith" said to have turned his arms against his mother country, and brought Rome weeping and terror-stricken to his feet to spare the city that had presumed to banish her best soldier. The appearance of Bishop Colenso at the Anthropological Society, a few weeks ago, was a repetition of the famous Coriolanus scene in a dwarfed and diminutive way. It fluttered the timid friends of missions to think that a missionary hero had returned to tell that it was all a mistake and a delusion. Africa, the prolific mother of monsters in the days of yore, when camel-leopards and crocodiles first startled the Romans, had produced another monster, more human than Du Chaillu's gorilla, more bestial than Gordon Cumming's Bosjesman. That monster, the hybrid birth of travellers like Burton and naturalists like Huxley, was called Anthropology, and all who presumed to doubt that the true history and dignity of man could be recovered and discovered by the aid of the new science, as Owen reconstructs a dinornis or a pterodactyl from a bone or a bit of a broken egg shell, were to be swallowed up alive of the monster, or shut up in a cage, debased specimens of the metamorphic period, from the true anthropoid ape to our air cousins and congeners of the Congo and Gold Coast.

There were some shrewd people, it is true, who could look the polysyllabic Anthropology in the face, and who even ventured to think that such attempts could do no harm, from a rooted conviction that gold tried seven times in the fire cannot be much hurt by another and eighth blast of the furnace of criticism. But all were not as wise or as well read in the history of apologies for the Bible. Like good George III., they did not know that the Bible wanted an apology, and were mightily concerned lest one of these apologies versus anthropology might prove the new society be too much for the old religion. What added to the consternation was to see the apologists by profession going over to anthropologists—ratting, as we should say, if the word were not—it did not imply that the old ark of orthodoxy was crazy and worm-eaten clipper of positive science the only seaworthy craft afloat.

We now write to disabuse our timid friends of their fears. An archbishop with the aid of a bishop too negative to be orthodox and too positive in tongue about it, has not come, seen, and conquered. Happily for the Christian religion and the faith of common-sense Englishmen, though they are as prodigious as ever, do not stretch our credibility all in vain. There was a certain Messer Millione, who returned from his travels to astonish his Venetian countrymen by the marvels he had seen; but he died out even in his lifetime, and labelled with that epithet with which he has gone into history for the million lies which he told. Ever since old Marco Polo discovered and discredited, travellers have learned caution, and in the end have ready means to check their accounts and cross-examine them. It is given to romance, a traveller of a cold and sceptical turn of mind to follow his track, and, like the author of "Eöthen," turn the fruits which his soul lusted after into apples of Sodom, by one light brush of ridicule and the needle of fact. On the other hand, travellers like Captain Burton come home to tell us, not so much that Christianity is too good for the heathen as was the old story—but that the heathen are too good to be improved by Christianity, are not allowed to say their say without let and contradiction at the meetings of the Anthropological Society. A Livingstone, a Krapf, or a Speke is sure to turn up at the opportune moment, and save the society's credit at the moment when they are about to commit themselves to a preference for Mumbo-Jumbo and the Grand Custom of Dahomey.

The appearance of Dr. Colenso as the advocatus diaboli at the annual beatification of modern missions held annually in London in May, did not send into us that thrill of apprehension with which it affected our forefathers. We have seen strange things in our day, but there is not an oddity or an anomaly in modern free thought that may not be capped by another as odd in the same line. Vixere hæretici ante Colensonem. There have been bishops as broad as Samosata to Rundell of Cork. There have been missionaries who have built their own nest, from the Abbé Dubois, of Indian memory, down to the Rev. John Newman, whose "Phases of Faith" began on a journey to Babylon in Babel. The Bishop of Natal is only thus a prodigy to those who have no history, and unwise enough to say that the things which now happen are new. To our mind, Dr. Colenso among the anthropologists was the strangest thing in the world. Gravity is the universal law from which no matter or mind is exempt. By an electric affinity, like draws to like, a tendency, therefore, that drove Dr. Colenso from the company of the orthodox to a Divine plan of raising the heathen from their present degraded condition towards those who believe only in natural agencies. No man can stand against one of the two attractions. He must either join the citadel of orthodoxy outside and league with its enemies. Coriolanus, driven from Rome under the Volscians; Dr. Colenso, struck off the list of vice-regents of the Gospel Propagation Society, is enrolled a member of the Anthropological Society.

To do Dr. Colenso justice, however, he does not join with the many who every one who subscribes a guinea to a foreign mission is defrauding

Englishman. He is generous enough to allow for the enthusiasm which he does not himself any longer believe in. He goes as far as to say that "those who have their hearts warmed with the knowledge of God's love would not be content with keeping the blessing to themselves; and whether the work was to be done at home or abroad, it was not money that would do it, but love, faith, and the spirit of self-sacrifice, in obedience to a higher law of duty, which was, in fact, the very essence of Christianity itself, which, in some way or other, they must exercise, if they were the true sons of the living God, and would live to life eternal, and which the Christian learned from the example of his Lord, and, above all, at the foot of the Cross." These are noble sentiments, but they were certainly not learned in the rooms of the Anthropological Society. The truth is, that men carry over with them into their new opinions a heaven of the old. Long after the sun has set, the whole sky is flushed with a pall of crimson and gold—there is a light in the sky, which is not of it, but a witness to the luminary that has already some time sunk from view. Night steals in to extinguish the day; but she first catches up the mantle of the god, as it falls from his chariot of fire, and wears it as her own—thus for awhile deceiving the simple, who suppose her to be a child of light, and not of darkness. So the pure and noble morality of a Lord Herbert or a Spinoza, a Hume or a Rousseau, is accounted for as garments filched from the children of light. And so the testimony of Bishop Colenso to the law of love and self-sacrifice, which must have jarred a little on ears attuned to scientific notions of naturalistic development only, is a recollection of a state of religious feeling that he has left behind.

The effect of Dr. Colenso's declaration at the meeting of the Anthropological Society will, after the first shock of surprise is over, be productive of good. It will confirm our wavering faith in the old-fashioned view, that a man cannot remain suspended for ever between half belief and no belief. He must either go forward or backward. Either doubt must eat away his little remaining faith, or faith, ripening to love, must disperse his remaining doubts, as sunshine does the morning mists. In our English common-sense way of viewing things, we cannot conceive a theoretical sceptic—one whose scepticism stops at the door of his study chamber, and does not go out into and influence his daily life. Certain speculative people have dinned into our ears, particularly of late, that a man's abstract notions may leave but the faintest possible impress on his practice—that a Spinoza, for instance, or a Hume, may lead a life of the purest benevolence, while doubting every existence outside their own, and dissolving their idea of God in the acid of subjective logic, as Asopatra drank pearls in vinegar. This refinement of scepticism, in which the hand does not say to the brain, "I have no need of thee," and practice of one kind can spring from principles of another—as the Arab grows a water melon out of a seed inserted into the root of the camel's-thorn of the desert—passes our comprehension. We confess to a logical impotence to conceive of such a disruption between theory and practice. As easily can we think of the abstract Lord Mayor of Martinus Scriblerus without his chain, without his glass coach, without his fur robe. We were staggered for a time. Bishop Colenso seemed almost an exception. Reasoning downward through the Bible history, he seemed to have doubted of everything, from Moses to Mahachi, and there his doubting stood still, or began to double in and out through the doctrines of the New Testament, choosing some and refusing others. What he refused we will not say, but what he seemed to retain was the belief that as a Christian bishop he was sent to teach the Zulus that there is none other name under heaven whereby they can be saved but the name of Jesus. But even here his doubts appear at last to have got the better of him, and now, stripped of all dogmas, he has reached the state of a bishop in puris naturalibus, or a bishop of natural sistency between an intuitional scheme of religion and a doctrina is over. Dr. Colenso is out-and-out an intuitionalist in practice a

This is as it should be. A man can only teach what he knows. We cannot give others what we have not got ourselves. So he professed himself an evangelist, while his convictions were altogether of another school, so long his position was unintelligible to people of plain convictions, quite untenable by himself. But he has had the logic to see this and confess it. Unlike others of the same school at home, who are mysticisms as not to understand the contradiction between their position to a church with a definite creed and those neo-Platonic fancies which is immanent everywhere, which "sleeps in the stone, dream wakes in the man," Dr. Colenso has come to the conviction, and his missionary is not so much the herald of a "mystery which has been long in the world began, but now is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith," the discoverer to the savage of that which was latent there by his consciousness, and a natural, not an adopted sense of sonship. We have a scheme of missions to suit a new theory of the Gospel. Let us see if it is likely to work. When our excellent Friends (we put a capital letter to save tautology, and to express our friendly feeling to the body that bears that title) really held the notions of Barclay and Fox, we are never engaged in any evangelistic efforts in the proper and peculiar sense. In our day many of that body are liberal contributors to the Bazaar, indirectly, but none the less effectually, forward the great common cause, the salvation of souls through the knowledge of Christ, the alone chart of salvation. But a mission of those who believe in the inner light has never yet been heard of by us. It is to be corrected if in error, and in the pages of Evangelical Christianity willing to acknowledge our mistake, if it is one. But to the best of our evangelistic effort on the part of a church holding an intuition has never been heard of. We say this not as casting a reproach again reasoning backward, for the want of one of the outlets of Christi f a superior race of men ever coming in contact with an inferior on purely secular ground without improving them off the face of the earth in any but a sense which philanthropy approves of, then we are shut up to the conclusion aut Christus aut nullus. If, in spite of Christianity and the dissuasive effect of Christian teachers, the civilised man seldom meets the barbarian without either driving him back into the wilds, making him more like a wild beast than he was before, or bows his back to the yoke and turns him into a beast of burden, what would it be if settlers unsoftened, unsanctified, were to take in hand the task of ameliorating the condition of the tribes in the interior of Africa? In New Zealand we see how the white race meet the aborigines, and the law of extermination begins. If these things are done in the green tree, what would be done in the dry? If, in spite of missionary influence brought to bear, both at home and on the spot, the law of displacement, as it is called, works itself out with relentless vigour, is it likely that this inexorable law of the lower yielding to the higher race would relent before the pioneers of a scientific mission, and, for the first time in history, dislodgement give place to example and quiet persuasion. We are not yet come to the time for the leopard to lie down with the kid, or black and white to mix blood together. Till the marriage of earth and heaven is complete, and the New Jerusalem has come down out of heaven as a bride adorned for her bridegroom, it is too much to desire results like these. Hence we can expect no more from science and civilization than a certain forbearance to missionaries and a certain indulgence of our folly of trying to make men one in Christ Jesus. The whole subject is one that lies outside the range of the Anthropological Society. Aristotle was, as all will admit, the anthropologist of excellence of his age; yet that the barbarian should be of one blood with the Greek did not once cross his conception. He spoke confidently enough of certain facts, which nature pointed at, one of the plainest of which was that nature had made the surrounding tribes who could not speak Greek to be slaves to those who did. If Aristotle and his great pupil, Alexander, could walk into a séance of the Anthropological Society, they would see their theories of nature disguised a little, it is true, and dressed up in modern phrase, but substantially the same as that taught two centuries before a great light broke over the hills of Judæa. But what would these venerable shades, the Stagirite and his royal pupil, think of a Christian bishop of such company, and apparently countenancing such theories? Would not the great Aristotle, the author of that shrewd definition of ἀγχινοια, or guessing at sight, exclude from seeing two men in company with whose antecedents there was nothing common, that they were plotting against a third, and that, by this law of the reaction of a common antipathy, Bishop Colenso and Captain Burton were found in the same room, drawn into a coalition against a common enemy, that old-fashioned evangelical spirit, which sends its missionaries out to East and West Africa with an open Bible and a belief that the only key to unlock savage hearts is the key of the house of David?

SELIM EFFENDI (REV. EDWARD WILLIAMS), THE FIRST CONVERTED TURK.*

SELIM EFFENDI was born in Amasia, in Asia Minor. His father was a Janissary, and he also was inscribed in his boyhood into the regiment of that military body to which his father belonged. When the Janissaries of Constantinople, in consequence of their revolt against Sultan Mahmoud and their refusal to accept the terms of amnesty offered them, were utterly destroyed, in 1826, the Janissaries of the provinces morality nor the Mohammedan faith gave any peace to his conscience. He spent many a time to the Greek and Armenian churches, but always at their image and picture worship.

After his marriage he settled in Salonica, in Government employ. Various motives led him to give up his place and go into mercantile life. He went to Constantinople about this time, at the house of a certain pasha he found a book on Christianity. His curiosity was so much excited, that he obtained a loan of the book, he stole it, and carried it with him to Salonica. After his conversion he went and returned the book, confessing his fault and the motives which led him to steal it.

About the year 1848 a pious Armenian, employed by the Government as a labourer for the Jews in Salonica, fell in with Selim Effendi, and discovered the New Testament. The book strangely attracted him; and in order to obtain it without observation, he learned the Armenian character, and the Bible in Armeno-Turkish. But he was far enough from being at all influenced by its teachings. The doctrine of Christ as God manifested in the flesh, and often roused his indignation, so that he would throw the book away. At which times his Mohammedan wife (now an excellent Christian) would pick it up, and, putting it on the shelf, would say, "Why do you throw it away? If you don't like it, give it back to the man from whom you got it." He always kept this Bible as a memento of his wife and of those who had helped her to convert him.

It was early in 1849 that the writer (Dr. Schauffler) was sent by the American Mission to locate two missionary families. He had been told that Selim Effendi and intended to call and see him. Selim Effendi anticipated him and called upon the writer in his room. It was simple curiosity which led him to ask the writer if he was in the habit of reading the New Testament. After the usual indispensable round of civilities, the writer asked him if he was in the habit of reading the New Testament, to which he replied in the affirmative. Curious to see how the book struck his mind, the writer asked him whether it appeared to him like an inspired book, or whether he felt it to be of Divine origin and an inspired book. He said, "it is the Word of God." The question was then asked whether he could believe that Christ was Divine—was God.

at his finger just there? But this is a serious matter. It will never do to trifle with, or to tell lies about such great and awful questions. Now I will go home and shut myself up; I will pray to God for light, and read this book, which is certainly true; and I will decide before God whether the book really says so, and if it does, whether I will accept it or not. And so I did, and then it pleased God to reveal His Son in me; and I instantly found that life, and peace, and salvation in Christ, which I now preach unto you." He did not conceal his new faith, and it became necessary for him to leave Salonica.

In the spring of 1852 he came with his family to Constantinople. A protracted difficulty in one of his limbs hindered him from coming at once to a conclusion as to how he should support his family. Meantime, Ramazan came. He could not conscientiously keep it, or pretend to keep it. This excited much attention in the quarter where he lived. One of his former acquaintances, a pasha, came to see him at this time, and told him that the Government would give him an office in European Turkey, and also take his sons into the military school. Selim Effendi at once comprehended the object of this generosity. His sons were to be separated from him, and placed under strong Mohammedan influences, and he put far away, where he must either turn back to Islam, or be crushed, with none to deliver.

He excused himself; but the offers were repeated in such a way as admitted of evasion or refusal. It was decided that he must fly at once with his family. Meanwhile, an order was sent to him from the Porte, ordering him to go at once to distant part of European Turkey, and to place his sons in the military school. The fact that such an order was sent, and that this was known in all the neighbourhood, became the providential means for them to escape without exciting any suspicion. A pious English merchant, not without some risk to himself, procured a passage for the family on board an English steamer for Malta. The benevolent captain was willing to risk his share. By the same steamer the writer dropped a line to the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society at Malta, to receive and befriend the interesting fugitives. Now they broke up, packing and winding up what they had. Neighbours and friends, dropping in, saw it, and, supposing that they were to proceed to the interior, wished them a happy passage, no doubt rejoicing that this deluded family was now going to be effectually saved from all Christian influence. In the clear daylight they had their effects carried to the next convenient landing-place, and put into boats; and thence proceeded, not to the Turkish steamer, but to the English steamer for Malta. Unfortunately, this steamer was to stop at Smyrna. On arriving there the police noticed with astonishment that there was a Mohammedan family on board the English steamer, going to Frank countries, and that, too, without a passport. The steamer was immediately removed to the quarantine harbour, and soon an officer of the pasha appeared to examine into the matter. He looked through the staterooms to see them, and lo! it was a former friend of Selim Effendi's, whom the pasha, while in office, had once helped out of prison. "Well done, Selim Effendi," he exclaimed, "is that you who are locked up here?" "Yes." "Why on earth are you without a passport?" "It was not convenient to get one." (Passports being then a new thing in Turkey, great carelessness about them was quite common.) But, look here, I wonder where you are all going." "We are going in a good way," said Selim Effendi. A good way, in the estimation of this orthodox Mussulman, was, of course, a pilgrimage to Mecca. "Bravo!" he exclaimed, "that is grand, all of you going together! Now, look here, you got me out of prison once. Now I will get you out. You come right to my house as my guests, until the steamer leaves. I will manage your passport for you." And so he did. He enter-

He is there I may be also." On landing, he was met by a man to the house of Rev. Mr. Lowndes. The family was kindly treated by friends in Malta, who contributed one sovereign a-week for their support, and two boys were put into the Protestant College.

In their stay at Malta they all learnt English, more or less. Selim Effendi was here hopefully converted, as his wife had been; these three persons were then baptized at the Presbyterian Church. But for three persons to live on one pound a-week, at Malta, was a great trial. Selim Effendi was always extravagantly charitable, and Malta swarms with the starving. They came into the most straitened circumstances, as the American Mission at Constantinople assumed the responsibility, which Mr. Lowndes had before urged them to do with confidence. One circumstance of his stay at Malta should not be omitted. The reason why Providence directed him to Malta. While there, he was lying there in the hospital with whom nobody could speak. He went there, and found the man very sick. He immediately preached to him; afterwards went often to see him, to teach him the way of salvation. The Catholic patients and managers of the hospital opposed him, but he persevered; and the man died in peace, expressing his faith in Christ, while Selim Effendi, on his knees beside his bed, was commending his soul to God in prayer.

The effect of the Crimean war upon the Turkish Government was such, that it seemed practicable, in 1855, to permit the exiles to return to Constantinople. The family, now consisting of four children, abode in Bebek, where the American Mission then had an educational institution. At this little village on the Bosphorus, the missionary labours of Selim, we will now call by his Christian name, Edward Williams—began, and was finished. Mr. Williams was not long here before he found opportunity. There was diagonally opposite to his residence, in Asia Minor ek in the evening, he edified his family and not a few native Christians who to listen to the remarks of the converted Turk, who never failed to overflow the love of Christ and of souls.

When the Crimean war was finished, and the troops returned, Mr. Williams taken into the service of the American mission, they having decided to enter Turkish work. In 1856 he was licensed to preach, after a most protracted exhortation by the missionaries, in the presence of one of the secretaries of the Board, whom the writer explained the questions and answers of that remarkable season. The secretary will not soon forget the remarkable degree of Scripture knowledge, the experimental acquaintance with Divine truth, which the candidate displayed. The writer does not remember that Mr. Williams misunderstood a single question, gave so much as one wrong or inadequate reply.

In 1857-8 the writer, on a visit to America, interested some friends in the cause, and obtained, as a private gift, the means of building a house for Mr. Williams to reside in, at Bebek. Late in 1858 he and his family removed into it, and this change of residence proved to be the occasion of a great influx of Mohammedan converts of every grade, even up to that of pasha.

Mr. Williams had a most extraordinary gift of introducing—in a very natural and inoffensive way—religious conversation, and was peculiarly happy in turning almost any subject of remark into a spiritual channel. Consequently, he was surrounded with men wishing to hear him talk, whether on board the passenger steamers plying on the Bosphorus or in Turkish coffee-shops, in public places, on the bridge, or by the way, and men called to continue privately conversations begun in public. At that time he was preaching regularly in two or three places of worship connected with the American Mission, where his audience consisted mostly of Armenians, but where Turkish hearers would often drop in quietly and listen.

A most unreasonable prejudice against Mr. Williams, as an Osmanli, existed among the Armenians, and it finally increased to such an extent, that he ceased preaching in these places of worship. "It makes no difference with me," he observed to the writer, "whether I preach in those places on the Sabbath. I am preaching every day of the week, on steamers, in the street, in every place, at all seasons of the day, and often deep into the night." At length a regular service was commenced at his house. This was providentially forced upon him. His house was filled with Turkish visitors, especially on the Sabbath, as soon as they understood that he was to be at home on that day.

Labouring, as Mr. Williams did, under the personal direction of the writer, he was, early on a Sunday afternoon, sent one of his sons, saying that the house was full of visitors, that he had to talk to them incessantly at any rate, and that it would be easier for him, and perhaps more to the purpose, if he should hold a regular service, and preach to them on some appropriate topic. To this the writer could not but assent, adding that he would come himself as a hearer. So he did, and the occasion was most interesting. These services continued and grew. Not only Turks, but Armenians and Arabs, to some extent, came; and soon an evening meeting was requested by them, to be held by the writer, to be devoted to the explanation of Old Testament passages concerning Christ, to show the connexion between the old dispensation and the new. Those coming from the city to these meetings had to be kept all night in different hospitable houses, Mr. Williams's being the chief resort.

At this time serious differences of opinion arose between Mr. Williams and the American Mission, as to the policy to be observed in his work. Meantime, not only did the Church Missionary Society establish a mission to the Turks, but the principles of your society seem to be such as will not serve the propagation of the Gospel in this land as effectually as I have reasons to expect that the principles of the Gospel will. I desire to mention that no foreign inducement has worked upon my mind in this final decision, and that, in disconnecting myself from co-operation with you, I am not forgetful of all the kind assistance afforded to me in my labours by your private friends in America and England, through your most friendly instruments. To the contrary, I shall ever cherish the sincerest love and respect toward you and the missionaries of the American Board in that universal Christian brotherhood which is the heavenly privilege of all the true members of the Church of Christ on earth.

EDWARD

Mr. Williams was not long in his new relation when he repented the step he had taken. He felt trammelled and annoyed by the prescribed prayer, and in his services at his house he gradually dropped them off. In some parts of the Prayer-book he had most serious objections. His own marked experience, as well as his views of Scripture, rejected baptism with the utmost decision. Once, in baptizing a Turkish girl, who after his third son, he said in his sermon (the writer being present), "Baptism is a generation. If it were, Paul could not have thanked God for hardening the hearts of the persons in Corinth, nor declared that he was sent not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel. No; Paul, who certainly wished all men to be regenerated, went about Corinth and all the world, baptizing, right and left, all who would receive baptism." When he went to Malta to be ordained he was surprised by what he saw on a British man-of-war on which he was entertained. The chaplain invited Mr. Williams to his own room. Mr. Williams, on entering, saw a great crucifix standing, and a light or lights burning before it. "That," he said to the writer, "I grew dizzy, and sought the door." "That," the chaplain said, "don't be in a hurry." "Excuse me," Mr. Williams replied, "it is so dark here, I cannot stay;" and off he went. The horror of the leaning of his new connexion towards transubstantiation at the Pera place of mission service greatly tried him. In view of the Church and the Puseyite party of the Episcopal Church, he several times wrote the writer: "It is Popery in disguise, a little modified and guarded character of Mr. Williams and his gentle wife remained the same through all these changes and trials; and his fraternal relation to the American missionaries, and especially to the writer, suffered no change. He rejoiced in all their successes and anticipated in all their trials.

In the persecution of last summer, which has been so fully brought under the notice of the Christian public, Mr. Williams was the first apprehended. He was seized by the police-officers, dragged through the streets, and for some hours confined in a dark, dirty hole. He witnessed a good confession, and, through the influence of the British Embassy, was released the same day, though so severely addled, that he suffered a long time from the consequences of the maltreatment he received. As he was being dragged through the streets and kicked, the passers-by, comprehending the state of the case, exclaimed, "Blessed art thou, Selim Effendi, who art permitted to suffer for Christ's sake." The cruel men in whose company he was exclaimed in wrath, "Where are there gallows enough to hang all these infidels?" Since that persecution Mohammedan inquirers have been scarce, and Mr. Williams's labours much circumscribed, though the number of Mussulmans he conversed with up to the time of his death averaged about one hundred per month, whom not a few dared even to come to his house. He was taken ill in the night of April 2. He had preached the day previous to a few who dropped in, and his family, and ceased by saying, "This is perhaps the last time I shall speak to you. I beseech you, listen to the Word while you hear it, and remember that both with me and with me it may even now be the last time." He seemed to have a presentiment of his coming release, but, as the desire to be absent from the body and to be present with Christ was characteristic rather of his habitual frame of mind, and often found expression in sighs and exclamations, the writer took no particular note of it. All that Christian friendship and medical skill could do. The disease was very painful, and culminated in a low intermittent fever, which terminated in death. He thought him poisoned, but there appeared no evidence to that effect. The evening before his death the writer saw him the last time. He then appeared better, but died suddenly toward morning. The last thing he said to the writer the evening previous was, "Blessed be God a thousand times for this affliction. Blessed be He; I can now say with Job, when he was tried as I am now, 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth Thee!'"

Mr. Williams died in the house provided for him by the writer, and his grave is an eminence overlooking the Bosphorus, belonging to the American Mission. He was buried by the clergy of the English Church, and a large number of English, American, German, Armenian, Greek, and Turkish friends and neighbours were present. It was to be regretted that the funeral services were all read in English, and were entirely unintelligible to most of those present. The widow, entirely in contrast with the prevailing customs of the East in such cases, bore the bereavement bravely, as a Christian woman, and lately said to the writer, "What thanks can I owe to God for having brought us out of the gross darkness of Islamism! Under this desolating system I should now despair, but in the glorious light of the Gospel I now where my husband is gone. I know that ere long I shall join him there, and that time grace sustains my sinking head and cheers my desolate heart."

present in countries where Romanism is dominant. In fact, the spirit of the Reformation is in harmony with the tendencies and legislation of modern governments. Observe what is passing in Prussia, in Holland, in Sweden, in Switzerland, and in the other states which belong to Protestantism: the members of the pastoral body, and their pious hearers, recognise without difficulty established institutions; and if there are some differences of opinion, they relate to minor points, the foundations of civil society never being endangered. A sincere and durable union is, therefore, possible between Church and State.

A very different state of things prevails among the Romanist nations. Here the disagreement is deep-rooted and permanent, and shows itself in the most serious matters. The Supreme Pontiffs and the principal dignitaries of the Popish Church have ideas, tendencies, and principles, almost entirely opposed to the spirit and tendencies of modern civilization. The Jesuits especially, who exercise so powerful an influence over the sacerdotal body, take every opportunity of crying up political systems altogether opposed to the state of things which prevails in modern society.

What is the result? Constant collisions between the priests and the Governments. M. Jules Favre, one of the most eloquent members of the Opposition, has recently pointed out, with much energy, in the Legislative Chamber, this deplorable antagonism. He showed by positive facts that the French political standing in the city of the Vatican.

The resignation of Prince Napoleon was officially accepted by the head of the State, and now all seems calm again. But this is mere deceptive appearance. The address of Jerome Napoleon is a striking symptom of the dangers which threaten, in an early future, the temporal Papacy. The public mind in France is more and more decided to abandon Pius IX. to his own fortune, and to demand the recall of the French garrison. Motives of prudence may, perhaps, delay such an event; but this affair can have but one issue, and Pius IX. will be the last king of the domain of St. Peter.

AMPHLET OF THE DUKE DE PERSIGNY UPON RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS.

As another remarkable proof of the state of public opinion, I may mention the pamphlet which has been written and published by the Duke de Persigny. This personage was one of the most faithful friends of Napoleon III. in his days of adversity, as in those of prosperity. He has done more than any other man, in political life, to place the crown upon the head of the Emperor, and he has discharged the distinguished functions of Minister of State.

Well, the Duke de Persigny recently made long stay at Rome, and studied with scrupulous attention what is occurring in the Pontifical city. He then addressed to M. Troplong, President of the Senate, a series of long letters, which have been issued as a pamphlet.

What are the sentiments expressed by M. de Persigny? The question is the more important as this statesman would not have dared to give these letters to the public without having previously obtained the consent of the Emperor. We have here, therefore, a sort of indirect revelation of the personal views of Napoleon III.

Certes, the Duke de Persigny is much more moderate than Prince Jerome Napoleon. He does not ask that the royal sceptre in the hands of Pius IX. should be immediately washed. Far from so doing, he heaps the most flattering compliments upon the person and character of the Pope. He represents the Pontiff as a wise, kindly, and most pious man, animated with the best intentions. But these are figures of rhetoric, or oratorical pretensions. The true spirit, the real object of M. de Persigny's pamphlet, is by no means favourable to the temporal Papacy, and the Jesuit faction fully perceived the views of the illustrious author, for it has attacked this publication with bitter violence.

M. de Persigny establishes these two points:—

1. There is at Rome a restless, ardent, and blind faction, composed in great part of the cardinals, who understand nothing of the present situation—of French, Belgian, Austrian, and other bishops, who detest modern civilization—of Jesuits, who would fain subject everybody to their intolerable despotism—and of coarse, ignorant monks, who are persuaded that the Revolution of 1789 inaugurated the reign of Satan. All the members and agents of this dangerous faction surround the Papal throne; they inspire Pius IX. with ridiculous terror, and make it their great study to keep him captive in their toils.

2. The Duke de Persigny expresses a hope that the Pope, when better informed as to the intentions of Napoleon III. and the political necessities of our era, will at length open his eyes; and after expelling or overthrowing the Jesuit party, will conclude a friendly arrangement with Italy. He thinks that when the French troops shall have been recalled, the Pontiff will grant his subjects more liberal institutions, and that the inhabitants of the Roman States will become citizens of the new Italian kingdom, with the same rights and liberties. According to the plan of the Duke de Persigny, Rome would continue to be under the direct authority of the Pope; but it would be assimilated, by its new institutions, to all the other great cities of the Peninsula.

Does M. de Persigny sincerely think that this project is capable of being realised? Or perhaps it is a mere Utopia, invented to get rid of the responsibility felt by Napoleon III.? I know not; but there is little probability that Pius IX. will consent to the reforms indicated by the French author.

GENERAL MEETING OF THE FREEMASONS.

I spoke in one of my previous letters of the dissensions which have arisen among the Freemasons. The controversy has been continued, not only within the Masonic lodges, but also in the press; and as important points of religion are involved, it is proper briefly to indicate the course of these debates.

The old regulations of the body of Freemasons ordered that every member should acknowledge the two great doctrines of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. These are the elementary principles of natural religion. But some Freethinkers declared that the obligation to adhere to capies of morality are completely independent of ideas of God and of a future life.

You see to what an extreme scepticism has proceeded among us. God and the immortality of the soul are considered as old-fashioned matters, as insignificant opinions or vain traditions, which exercise no influence upon individual, domestic, or social life. Voltaire and his disciples, the men of '93, showed more moderation and decency; they proclaimed the necessity of believing in God and in a future state of existence. But the nineteenth century no longer accepts these chains of the past. Progress claims the right not to be arrested by any negation whatever!

The quarrel has run very high, and the Freethinkers have shown once more that in declaring themselves the apostles of toleration, they were excessively intolerant. At length, a meeting of delegates, representing the entire body of French Freemasons, recently convened in Paris, put the question to a general vote. The journals announced that it was decided by eighty-six votes against eighty-three, that the doctrines of the existence of God and of the immortality of the soul should be retained in the regulations of the association. Natural religion has thus gained a majority of three! This is a poor result, and atheism counts upon a speedy victory.

PROPOSED LAW ON ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

Let us pass to a less painful subject. The Emperor announced, at the opening of the legislative session, that national education de-

But on the other hand, they know very well that the majority of our flocks energetically disavow their scepticism; and as they claim to retain their pastoral position, they dare not openly reveal the secrets of their minds and hearts. This shocking system of concealment and equivocation cannot last long: sincerity is an essential condition of existence in every church.

A ROMISH BICENTENARY.

The first subject of interest as to time, has been the 200th anniversary of the canonization of François de Sales at his birthplace, Annecy, now belonging to France. His name, associated by Mgr. de Ségur with the Ultramontane society now vigorously supporting all the modern follies of Romanism, and counter-acting Protestantism heart and hand, brought together multitudes of the curious and multitudes of the deluded, headed by four cardinals, fourteen bishops, and eight hundred priests. The relics were dressed out in canonicals, and touched by rings and crosses and other trifles, which become amulets by the contact. The present Popish Bishop of Geneva gave discourses every day, and much rejoicing ensued in the Jesuit camp, especially from the act of Romanism progressing in Geneva; and a brilliant contrast was drawn between the decked-out and worshipped relics of François and Calvin's utterly unknown grave! I gave you the statement of finances of this society in the March number; the following is that of its elder sister, the Work of the Propagation of the Faith. Its receipts, all over the world, amount to 1,471,020 francs, in which France stands for 3,479,296f. (343,954f. from Lyons, the seat of this missionary society, 245,759f. from Paris); Italy for 428,291f.; Belgium, 101,028f.; Germany, 254,185f.; North America, 167,316f.; South America, 39,053f. The French journal which gives these figures adds: "After all, it is but little compared with what was given during the same year 1864 by English Christians for the progress of the kingdom of God—viz., 33,000,000 francs!"

THE ISRAELITE ALLIANCE.

The next interesting event took place on the 25th of May; it was the fifth general meeting of the Universal Israelite Alliance. It was held, as last year, in Herz's brilliant concert-room, and the attendance of members was more than double. About 1,000 were present; and for the first time many ladies attended. This was taken especial notice of by the President, M. Crémieux, whose speech was almost wholly inspired thereby. He gave a brilliant and touching review of all the prominent women of olden time, from Eve to Esther, "not a legendary history, but the sacred one," and pleaded that all latitude should be given to woman to bring up children nobly: "Let us give her free expansion, and be her protectors." As to the Alliance, it is going on with electric speed, and has become a moral power in the world. The report states the Alliance to have outstepped its little circle; adhesions have been numerous, 1,150 new members have joined it during the year; letters from all countries have been received, describing all kinds of persecution. Some places, even in Europe, are very dark, but there is generally a remarkable change in the conduct of people towards the Jews. The consular agents of European states are enlisted in the cause of liberty, and act on every just appeal from the Alliance in favour of persecuted sons of Jacob. Interesting details were given respecting Switzerland, Wurtemberg, the Ionian Isles, Moldo-Wallachia, Servia, Turkey, Morocco. The chief work of the Alliance is schools, the establishment of which is being promoted among rich and poor. The receipts for the year amount to 22,100 francs, and the expenditure to 18,995 francs.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—LIBERATED SLAVES. HUNGARIAN PROTESTANTS.

A new section of the Evangelical Alliance has been constituted, as last year intended, at Etaules. A large number of pastors and laymen of the Charente Inférieure and surrounding districts met, and had two delightful days of public and private devotion. A paper was read on the subject announced—viz.: "On the Progressive Development of the Revelation of God in the Old Testament."

The active benevolence towards the four millions of emancipated slaves, mentioned in my last letter, has taken the form of a general committee of ladies, each member of which forms groups of other ladies, every group pledging itself to procure 125 francs; the sum total to be employed in purchasing materials to be made up into clothing by the donors.

There has been a touching fraternal correspondence between Dr. Grandpierre and others, in the name of the Conference of 200 pastors meeting in Paris, and Pastor Torok, of the Reformed Church at Pesth. An address is circulated among the churches in France soli-

Ploemel Friars' house at Nantes, where they had all most unexpectedly been taken, and placed with Pastor Cabos, at Nérac. These three, on their late return through Paris, were met at the Presbyterial house by many friends, hastily invited, and most interesting communications and exhortations ensued; the three are sons of chiefs, who are at the same time faithful pastors. The other three, among whom is the son of Pomaré, were educated at the convent. They have all returned together, by order of the Minister of Marine, on Pomaré's desiring to see her son back.

Christian charity is more and more called forth, and is more and more responsive as hearts become more engaged in the Lord's cause. At the same time, needs increase. The interesting institution for the deaf and dumb, at St. Hyppolyte du Fort, now requires ground and a building of its own; in prospect of this, 50,000 francs had been reserved, but the same amount is needed in addition. The

Florence, June 17, 1865.

The Synod of the ancient Vaudois Church met this year in the parish church of San Giovanni, near La Tour, on the 18th of last month. These assemblies in olden times were few and far between, owing to persecution. Some twenty years ago they were held at an interval of four years, as it lization Board" manages wide-spread missionary st ample and interesting pri two Commissions are laid opening of each Synod, s would be impossible for sialtical court of the Wal operations in so short a s

1. The outstanding feature of this year's Waldensian May Meeting was the remarkable concourse of Christian strangers from all over Italy. I almost fear to load your columns with the bare list of their names; and yet I believe and hope that the list will go on increasing year by year; for no other land now compares in interest with Italy, for civil and religious efforts after freedom; and no description can possibly exaggerate the present momentous influence of the old historic Evangelical Church on the plains of the Italian peninsula. The closing discourse was delivered in Italian by the Rev. Mr. Turin, of Milan, from Luke iv. 16, who eloquently expounded the true doctrine of the Church, which is the body of Christ, and should therefore be cherished, not on the Judaic or Romish theological principle, nor after the multitudinarian system, but be composed of living Christians. However much may have been said to the contrary, this is the constitutional principle of the Waldensian Church, and it is worthy of notice how earnestly the members of the Table of late years have insisted on the various congregations on this essential point, which in practice was too much neglected from, amid the decay of godliness at the commencement of the century. The ordinary membership of the Synod was well represented, and consisted of 5 annuated pastors, 16 parish ministers, 16 elders from these 16 parishes, who were either syndics, schoolmasters, or farmer-proprietors, 9 evangelists, 8 professors, and 5 members of commissions; in all, 72 representatives. The formal examination of mandates and appointment of Mr. Pilatte, of Nice, as president is soon got through, and then the spiritual prosperity of the parishes, the condition of the public schools, the accounts of the Normal School, Orphanage, &c., the management of Sabbath-schools, the amount collected for missions, and other disconnected with the inner life of the church, have thorough attention paid to. In this connexion we were delighted to hear that so much as £46 had been contributed by this poor people for missions to the heathen; that excellent libraries of Christian books were popular in the remote parishes; that the Normal School, the secret Latin class, and La Tour College had attendance of 64, 43, and 85 pupils respectively; that Sabbath-schools were all but universal in the Valleys; that 1,500*l.* had been raised in the Italian funds by some English ladies in support of the Orphanage; and that a general revival of religion was evidenced by the increase of prayer-meetings and the more regular attendance on the means of grace.

After a full discussion, the Synod adopted the principle of the free nomination of pastors, and remitted to congregations the task of arranging the monetary changes involved. Until this year the young Waldensian pastors have gone, by law, to the bleak mountain parishes, and, as vacancies occurred, have descended to the fertile plains in rotation. In this way alone have these highland flocks been supplied with ordinances, and the sad state of things been avoided which has occurred on the French side of the Alps, in the Valleys of Felix Neff; where the people are unable to obtain a stated ministry. Some agitation having taken place, it is now resolved to leave all the parishes free to call any of the ordained ministers of the Church; but, as a condition to this, it is requisite that the allowances to the pastors in the snow-bound regions be improved, and it is remitted to the people to equalise the salaries. There is no doubt that the advantages connected with this new plan preponderate over those of the system of rotation; but liberty brings with it additional responsibilities, and must be paid for. A healthy stimulus will thus be imparted both to ministers and peoples. Preachers will be called, not on the ground of age, but of character and preaching power; and those who have for years devoted themselves to the outfield of evangelization, and thus forfeited their right of rotation, will be open at any time, as well as their brethren who stay at home at ease, to a call to the ministry in their dearly-beloved Valleys.

It should be mentioned that in the course of the discussion, during several years, of this question, which has now been settled, a divisive course has been followed by a few hasty members of St. John, who have separated themselves and formed an independent church, under the pastorate of Mr. Cocorda, a young minister of the Waldensian Church, who laid himself open to censure at last Synod. From what I could learn, this secession is not likely to last long, although it is appealing for aid to Free Congregationalist Churches outside the Valleys. It has not originated in any living religious movement, but is rather the sectarian action of various groups of malcontents, who for the moment have united their incongruous elements. The Synod wisely abstained from taking any action in the matter, and many of the seceders are returning to their ancestral pews in the parish church.

the sitting of the Synod. The Waldenses have lately raised a handsome monument in the churchyard of La Tour, where he lies buried, to their great friend and benefactor, General Beckwith. It has cost 120*l.*, and the people are naturally very jealous that none but pure Vaudois, out of a sentiment of gratitude, should be allowed to take part in the expense. The whole Synod, together with the children of all the schools of La Tour, marched in a long and solemn procession to the inauguration of the monument, which bears the escutcheon of the General, and is surmounted with his bust. Here are the inscriptions chiselled on the four sides of the massive granite pedestal, the two last being favourite expressions of General Beckwith :—

OF ITS ILLUSTRIOUS AND CONSTANT BENEFACTOR, MAJOR-GENERAL BECKWITH,
THE GRATEFUL WALDENSIAN CHURCH.

“Born at Halifax, in America, Oct. 2, 1789.
Came for the first time to the Valleys, Sept., 1827.
Died at La Tour, July 19, 1862.

“I have wrought in my generation ; it lies with those who come after me to follow up the work begun, and to consign it, in a more perfect shape, into the hands of their successors.

“If I should meet, in the world to come, an old woman and two little children among those who have profited by the seed which I have sown, I shall consider myself amply recompensed for all the sacrifices I have made for the schools, in which the little that is taught is absolutely true and absolutely good, being founded on repentance towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.”

The multitude of young people around the grave joined in singing a few thrilling hymns :

Beckwith, as a pattern of piety, were most aptly illustrated in his own letters, which, with a view to a biography, were made aware of the lifelong exertions of the Vaudois of this intricate but I confess to have I fear most people are—sagacity, ripe Christian felicity of expression distils. When this promise which I have promised in English, I feel sure the most place among our biographies at home.

The reception of it, however, was the crown of the Synod. Scotland, in his strongly represented. I there appeared the Rev. Mr. Liberton ; Mr. Somerville, of Shandon ; Mr. Collie, of Leghorn ; Mr. M'Dougall, of Florence. Established Church was in Edinburgh ; while the Church had sent Dr. M. and Dr. Andrew Thorburn. Dr. Alexander Stewart, the Irish Presbyterian, was in that of the Church. Mr. Piggott was from the Wesleyan word from the Evangelical Society of Germond, from the Free

The versatile and eloquent genius of the Moderator was taxed to the uttermost in replying to these varied deputations, but was more than equal to the emergency, and excited the admiration and delighted astonishment of the listeners. No small merriment was evoked when the Free Church deputies were called, and when, through some misunderstanding, the United Presbyterian deputies were found standing alongside of them, and were with difficulty made to comprehend that the churches were being replied to separately. It was taken in excellent part, as a good omen for the success of the proposed union of these two churches at home. In community of opinion, and sympathy, and fraternal action, it was evident that the union was already a fait accompli.

The conviction speedily took hold of the minds of the Synod, and of the foreign brethren themselves, that such an unusually strong representation of the Churches of Christ, especially of the three Churches of Scotland, was providential, and should be made good account of. The missions of the Church in Italy, as the report shows, have now taken so wide an extension, the need of more evangelists is so keenly felt, and yet the means for the support of the present staff is so precarious, and so hardly raised, that much prayer has been lately offered that God would open up a way for the establishment of some steady, considerable, and permanent supply of funds for the maintenance and enlargement of the evangelistic enterprise at such a propitious moment in the fortunes of Italy. Not a few, therefore, saw God's hand in this large gathering of influential men from various parts of Great Britain and Ireland. An extra synodical action was entered on at a meeting of these brethren, presided over by Dr. Guthrie. Ample information was communicated, and various plans were canvassed; and I trust that 1865 will not pass by without leaving behind it, in various parts of our country, active and influential societies in aid of Waldensian missions, and corresponding somewhat to the claims of this noble old Church on the sympathies of all her younger and wealthier sisters, and to the interest that is so widely taken in the spiritual welfare of poor Italy. In earnest hope of the success of this movement, we may well take leave of this year's Synod, as of one of the most memorable in Vaudois history.

While the Waldensian Synod was assembled in the North, another interesting meeting was being held at Bologna—lasting over four days—of the representatives of the different Free Christian Churches in Italy. There were thirty-two deputies present from twenty-two churches, in Milan, Genoa, Florence, Naples, &c. "These all," writes one of their evangelists, "unanimously declared themselves to be one and the same church, to be called the 'Free Christian Church in Italy'; each individual church, however, remaining independent of the others. With equal unanimity of sentiment, these churches, feeling the need of a more perfect organization, in accordance with the Word of God, have entered upon the work of securing it, seeking counsel from Christian experience, and the assistance of the Holy Spirit." English Christians will be delighted to hear that the Free Italian Churches have thus inaugurated proceedings in the direction of unity, form, and order; and that at the conference in Bologna the objections and difficulties of the few in reference to organization were overruled by the growing convictions on this matter of the many. We heartily wish God speed to this movement. It is true that no definite step has yet been taken, no confession of faith or form of church government having been adopted, nor has even a committee for the preparing of these been appointed. The whole subject is remitted simpliciter to the various congregations, who during the year are fully to consider the questions involved, and to report formally thereupon to a similar assembly next summer, when the outward bond of union among the churches will be established. Meanwhile it is cause of great thankfulness that so large and harmonious a meeting of these Free Italian Brethren has been held; and we trust that all success will attend this effort towards the unification of their churches on a scriptural basis.

Of the Milan Committee, as well as of the de Sanctis-Gavazzi union movement, with which Mr Piggott, of Milan, of the Wesleyan Mission, strongly sympathises, I shall inform your readers later.

There are also two politico-religious topics upon which considerable excitement prevails in Italy. The first refers to the mission of Vegezzi to Rome, to deal with the Holy Father, on the part of the Italian Government, in regard to the appointment of bishops to the vacant sees of Italy, now nearly forty in number. The Pope took the initiative by writing to the King of Italy, who, to the surprise of every one, immediately responded with cordiality; and for two months transactions have been going

tants has just appeared from the Clauress of Florence. It is the "Roma " of Dr. de Sanctis, to which we might give the English heading of "Behind enes in Rome." It is the crowning of de Sanctis' pen, and forms a treasure-of argument, anecdote, and illustration, the Church of Rome. Anything con-

Puseyite is taken to Rome under the guidance of a worthy Waldensian pastor, and there an Evangelical Churchman and an ardent Papist join the conversations, and the veil is lifted gradually, and the penetralia of Romanism brought to the light of day. The reviews of the work in Italy are exceedingly flattering;
and for beauty of form and elegance of finish,
it is highly creditable to the Evangelical press.

Dr. C. Schwarz, of Gotha, one of the negative theologians of this party, a of undeniable talent, as all know who have read his "History of Modern Theology."

After the adoption of the rules of the society, the President observed that it was founded for the defence of Protestantism, which is menaced on two sides—on the part of Ultramontanism and on the part of ultra-Lutheran orthodoxy. He cited in proof the Papal Encyclical—that absolute condemnation of all liberty, and the scarcely-disguised approbation which it has received in the politico-religious party which predominates in the north of Germany.

The chief address of the sitting was delivered by Dr. Rothe, Professor of Theology at the University of Heidelberg. Those who are able to appreciate this man—eminent as a thinker and as a theologian, and vénérable for his age, his character, and his piety—cannot but deeply regret to see him engaged in the efforts of a party to which he is very superior, even in his theology, which, notwithstanding serious errors, rests upon revelation, upon miracle, upon the divinity of Jesus Christ, and upon His resurrection, although differing from the orthodox system.
He has been led to this association, on the one hand by his somewhat strange views as to the Church, and on the other hand by the affliction he experiences through seeing the immense majority of our generation become estranged from the Church as it exists at the present day. He is convinced that new means must be tried for recalling these masses; and it is exactly this which was the subject of his address at Eisenach: "By what Means the Members who have become Estranged from the Churches can be Restored." It appears from the reports that this address made so powerful an impression, that, not to weaken it, the assembly gave up the discussion of the subject, and decided upon the publication of it as an expression of its opinion. When I source of difficulties, as well for the State as for the Church. The mover, Dr. Holzendorf, proposed the only practicable solution—the introduction of civil marriage, which is itself a question warmly debated in Germany ; but it seems that even in the meeting at Eisenach this proposal encountered opposition, and no definite result was arrived at.

The other matter, the introduction of which was committed to Dr. Schwarz, was this : “The Liberty of Teaching, and its Limits.” It is evident that the occasion of this question was the struggle carried on about Dr. Schenkel, of Heidelberg, of whom you know that the Evangelical pastors of the province of Baden have solicited the removal as Principal of the Theological Seminary, but without being able to obtain it. Moreover, although Dr. Schenkel is one of the most active members of the Protestant Association, and attended the meeting at Eisenach, it was in the nature of things that he should not there take one of the leading parts, at least not in the public discussions. I do not believe this Protestant movement has a great future before it ; for the simple reason that nothing durable is founded with negations ; but it may exercise a somewhat considerable influence over the reconstruction of the churches of our different provinces of Germany in regard to the popular self-management which I have indicated above. And this external transformation, though itself necessary to religious liberty, will only be a transition to a state of things more true and more perfect.

But for a long while he had become, those who remained estranged from him, a person who commanded veneration who by his love subdued all rebels. Dr. Mallet had been frequently ill last winter, but the most violent sufferings of the body had not been able to disturb the serenity of his mind. The love and the glory of the world to come were the atmosphere in which he breathed. The abundance of his heart his mouth uttered. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my hand forget itself!" Such was the prayer which filled his heart. Nevertheless, his last conflict was very violent. He died to sigh out 'Lord, when wilt Thou break my bands?' and again, 'Lord, come to me, and deliver my soul.' On the evening of his death, his friends sang in a low voice around his couch the hymn, 'Christ is risen,' and as they found he drew consolation from it, they sang this beautiful hymn on to the end. Very soon after he died. May the Lord cause to grow the fruit of his faith, of his conflicts, of his sufferings that they may bear fruit for eternity!"

WASHINGTON TRAGEDY AND PUBLIC OPINION IN GERMANY.

Of the remarks which reached us from Frankfort have elicited the following communication:—

Wurtemberg, June 2, 1865.
Frankfort correspondent, in his letter of the 1st, has tried to answer the question, "What has been the part of Germany as regards the events of April?" He reports that in view of the assassination of Lincoln was with apparent indifference, though some were indeed moved to tears, and jumps to the conclusion that "Germany" has behaved rather very far from satisfactory. He will, he writes, search out the causes of this simply, "as a historian," attests it, and regret for his country.

I cannot help feeling that the sweeping condemnation that may appear implied by this statement stands in need of correction or limitation; also that the assertion which follows it, that the greater part of the religious men of Germany identify Christianity with absolutism, seems to rest rather on an assumption which may perfectly explain itself by the neighbourhood of Hesse Cassel, than on proofs actually collected from the whole of Germany. We have, it is true, some papers, such as the Kreuzzeitung, Hengstenberg's Church Gazette, the Volksblatt, &c., which advocate the cause of our High Church party, and abuse abolitionism, liberalism, humanitarianism, republicanism, &c., to their hearts' content. But how has your correspondent ascertained that the adherents of this party comprise the greater number of the religious men of Germany? It is the mere guess of a single man. "A historian" ought at least to know that the Christian press of Southern Germany, Rhenish Prussia, of the Hanse Towns, and other parts, is just as decided in favouring the cause of the American Union, the emancipation of the negro, and the moderate but steady progress in all political and social institutions. To me it seems that no country in the world has taken greater interest than Germany in the mighty struggle across the ocean. It would be strange if it had been otherwise, for how many of our sons and brothers have been engaged in it! And from what I have seen and heard and read, I can fearlessly state, that no event of modern times has made a deeper impression on the Christian public of Germany than the assassination of that good man on the day when the war was concluded by the thanksgivings at Fort Sumter. Our sympathy was certainly warmer than that of several Evangelical parties in Great Britain. For this we are continually reproved by the High Church party, in whose publications your correspondent, if he does not see ours, may read what are the sentiments of the "soi-disant Christian papers of South Germany." Though, however, British friends may be misled by the one-sided view of your correspondent, the same effect is not to be feared in America, where a freer and fuller contact with the German mind has made the public better acquainted with the real state of matters.

G.

Having forwarded a copy of the above to our Frankfort correspondent, he has requested the insertion of the following reply:—

First of all, I will say that I have read with the most sincere pleasure your correspondent's remarks contradictory of mine, notwithstanding their rather sharp tone, which is accounted for by a laudable patriotism, in which I share. I would that there might reach you such from all parts of Germany. This would prove to me that my own observations, written in sadness, were only local, and I should be greatly rejoiced by it. Unhappily, I must maintain, that to the extent to which I have made them, those observations remain; and it is precisely in reference to that extent that there is between "G." and myself far more misunderstanding than difference of view. For, in the first place, I know very well that all the liberal press of Germany sympathises with America. I have myself mentioned with satisfaction, not only the horror of its might have shown that one of these organs—that which exercises the greatest influence over the pastors and laymen strictly orthodox in the church of the north and the centre of Germany, after having pronounced over all America, as a nation, the most unjust judgments—has designated Lincoln in these terms: "That man of agitation. For the rest, it is on which are too general to be an absolute solution. And, by agreeing with your correspondent's sympathies for America, against subjects more sacred yet, I hereby put my brotherly hand.

BOHEMIA.

EDUCATIONAL AND PROTESTANT MOVEMENTS IN PRAGUE AND ROSENDORF.

Though the educational effort described in the following letter is not directly religious, we agree with our correspondent in thinking that it must tend to Protestantism. We gladly welcome any intelligence respecting isolated congregations which are here and there struggling into existence and seeking to uphold the religion of the Bible.

Dresden, May 23, 1865.

Your readers will perhaps like to hear some news about Bohemia. I went from Dresden to Prague on Easter Monday, having been specially invited by the Rev. Adrian Van Andel, the missionary of the Free Church of Scotland to the Jews there, to preach at his English service on that day. The service was held in St. Michael's Church (Lutheran), to which Mr. Van Andel has at present wisely attached himself, in order to gain a position from whence to carry on his peculiar work. I was much surprised to find the church well filled, about 250 persons being present. Not more than thirty of these were English or Americans, if there were even so many—the rest were Germans, Bohemians, and Jews. There may have been fifteen of the latter present, and many Roman Catholics. The congregation seemed drawn together by the novelty of an English service, and by a desire to hear the English language. The scheme I allude to was originated with a Bohemian carried on by him mainly, I think, among his own people.

Mr. Vojta Náprstek is a Bohemian who has spent seven years in some time in London, where of the Exhibition of 1862.

He gained by travelling out of the country, he determined not to keep it to himself, but to impart it to his

With this view, he resolved to found a museum in Prague of a similar kind to the one at South Kensington, and to place in it as many books as possible throwing light on the scientific, literary, industrial, and moral institutions of England and Scotland. He knew full well that it was not enough to have books unless readers were to be found to read them, and to start a museum first interested in its contents. To attain this purpose, he had collected views on a large scale (of 50 inches by 36) of upwards of 100 institutions in England, Scotland, and America, moral, educational, and created by benevolent individuals.

Among these views are the Crystal Palace, the Hospital and Donaldson's Hospital, the Industrial Museum, Edinburgh, and the hospitals in London; of the an, as the Dalhousie Institute at Calcutta, Jarnsetjee Jejeebhoy's Hospital and Medical College at Bombay.

His views are all to be seen at Mr. Náprstek's museum, which is at present in his own residence, 269, Betlemasky Plácek u Halánku, Prague. With their aid he has given numerous lectures in Prague, to which admittance was by no means free; and yet these lectures have been attended by upwards of 1,500 persons, although the lectures occupied two, three, and even four days in delivery.

Mr. Náprstek's object is to exhibit to the Bohemian people the noble influence liberty has on the mind of man, and to show what has been done in other lands by noble-minded individuals or by charitable associations. The position of women in Bohemia, especially, is very inferior. Mr. Náprstek has much at heart to seek to raise their position. Lectures have been delivered by him on women's work, what they have done, and what they can do; on their education, mental training, the sewing-machine, &c., &c. The noble examples of Miss Fitchingale and other female workers in the cause of humanity have been set before the Bohemian ladies. Many books on this subject are in Mr. Náprstek's museum, and any contributions of works on it will be most gratefully received by him.

You would be surprised to hear how much English is studied in Prague. Mr. Náprstek has lent books out of the library to more than 100 persons, and he assists several Bohemians in their English studies by paying the expense of their lessons out of his private purse.

Our readers will easily perceive the importance of this work, and they can, with very little trouble, materially assist it. Presents of books, on topics such as I have alluded to, would be most acceptable. Reports of the benevolent institutions in any place, or of hospitals, schools, colleges, clubs, museums, &c., industrial institutions, will be thankfully received. If accompanied with views of the same, much the better. Precise information regarding such institutions as La Martiniere, Calcutta, &c., of universities and colleges anywhere, are very desirable. Mr. Náprstek's collection of pamphlets on London institutions is tolerably complete; but he has very few on the provincial as of England and Scotland. Ireland is almost wholly unrepresented, with the exception of a very few works in the library.

Mr. Náprstek has a collection of many thousands of stereoscopic views in his museum, and it is highly desirable should be increased. Sales of such, or books for the library, may be sent directed to me, care of my publishers, Messrs. Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, London, W.C., and enclosed, within the parcel, for the Bohemian Museum. I am (D.V.) leaving this week for my sojourn of two months in England and Ireland; the Rev. C. B. Gribble, M.A., chaplain of Constantinople, kindly supplies my place, and I shall be very happy to take back such communications with me.

The importance of this work can scarcely be exaggerated; as such a library and museum not only spreads information with respect to the state of liberty in Great Britain and America, but also may, with God's blessing, stir up the Bohemians to emulation in the cause of philanthropy. Any movement in this direction must tend ultimately towards Protestantism. Christian friends, however, will understand that the movement is as yet purely philanthropic. Books, however, on missions abroad, especially when illustrated, will be well received; and some few are already in the library, as, for instance, one of the works of Bishop Smith, late of Victoria, Hong Kong.

Mr. Studnicka, a friend of Mr. Náprstek, and who is the artist who has executed the views before alluded to, is to visit Dublin about July, in order to see the Exhibition there. He will gladly give any information, if required. Travellers visiting Prague would be much interested if they would pay Mr. Náprstek a visit.

As I am writing about Bohemia, I wish to lay before your readers the state of a congregation in that country which stands in need of Christian sympathy and assistance. The Reformed congregation in Moteschowitz, near Czaalau, is making great efforts to build a church there. The place where they used to perform divine service was very old and badly built, and has twice been burnt down. The district or parish includes Czaalau and some adjoining villages, and the community desire to erect their new church at Czaalau, as being more central. Collections have been made here among the Germans, and I have also forwarded a small contribution from my congregation. But the sum required is not yet made up, and the wants are urgent. British Protestants ought not to be forgetful that the light of the Gospel once shone from Bohemia into the rest of Europe. May some be stirred up to help on this work.

A very remarkable movement, of which another time I may communicate to you more details, has been going on for the last four years in a village on the confines of Bohemia, called Rosendorf. The village lies only three or four miles from Herrnskretchen, a little out of the ordinary route of travellers. Somewhat about ninety conversions from Romanism have taken place there, and the work is gaining ground. Being very near the Saxon boundary, Bibles have been procured, and the work has progressed up to the last six months without help from without. The Lord has blessed His own Word with success. There was a man in this village who was almost a thorough infidel, and annoyed the Romish priest much by his infidel views. Despairing to convince him in the ordinary way, this priest directed him to read the Bible. He did so, and soon was led by grace to lay aside his unbelief, and not only so, but to see that the Church of Rome was not in accordance with the Scriptures. The priest endeavoured to stop his going so far, but without success; he read and spoke of the Scriptures to his fellow-villagers, and his altered character led them to respect the truth he taught. The Moravians from Herrnhut sent brethren to help on the work by advice; and, since no Protestant denominations except the Lutheran and Reformed communions are tolerated in Austria, their agent, Rev. Conrad Beck, has put himself in connexion with the Lutheran pastor of a place some miles off, and works in the capacity of what is called Pfarr-Vicar. The Moravians have built a very neat and roomy place of worship, containing also rooms for the minister, which can accommodate about 200 persons, or even more. I paid a visit to the spot on a Saturday, and was much pleased with the little I saw, and with what I heard from the pastor. My friend, Rev. A. Van Andel, of Prague, accompanied me, and remained there to preach on the following Sunday. The people were much pleased to see us. Bible meetings are held weekly in the village and in one of the outlying hamlets, and fifteen persons within the last six months have renounced Popery. The pastor is entirely supported by his people, and there is no necessity for seeking any foreign assistance. I was much pleased with his appearance; he seemed a simple and earnest evangelist of considerable ability. The Moravians have several persons travelling through this country to look after the lost sheep of Israel. May their work be more and more blessed. When I return to Dresden after my leave of absence in England I hope to visit Rosendorf again.

It may interest you to hear that the work of colportage has been commenced in this city of Dresden. Some months ago the Rev. Dr. Simon, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Berlin, in company with Dr. Fehrszen, the Treasurer of the English Church, and myself, called upon the Herr von Falkenstein, the Saxon Minister of Religion, to ask for permission to employ a colporteur here. This permission had been refused some years ago, on the ground of the British and Foreign Bible Society not circulating the apocryphal books. But I rejoice to say that no impediment was put in the way on this occasion, and after some delay the required permission has been granted, and operations are forthwith to commence. I would ask the prayers of Christians for a blessing on this work in this important city, where so many Russians, Poles, Jews, as well as Germans, reside.

Yours very truly,

CHARLES H. H. WRIGHT, M.A., British Chaplain at Dresden.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have received the following from the Rev. A. Van Andel on the Protestant movement I have alluded to:—

“Prague, 583, Krakauer-gasse, June 7, 1865.

“Dear Sir, According to my promise, I now write to let you know some further particulars regarding the people at Rosendorf, and I am happy to be able to state as my strong conviction, that not only do I hold the work to be genuine, but that there exists in that congregation a remarkable amount of spiritual life, of sound Evangelical knowledge. The simplicity and sincerity of the people are quite affecting, and one only understands how those persons have attained to such a degree of Christian knowledge and experience when one takes into consideration the furnace of trial and affliction through which many of them have had to pass these twenty to thirty years. During this time, however, the leadings and the support the Lord were obvious and marvellous, and withdrawn before priests and magistrates, they remembered the words of the Lord Jesus, ‘I thought how or what ye shall speak,’ truly in their case also ‘it was given them that same hour what they should speak.’

“The Sunday I spent among them was really a delightful day. In the morning, about 10 o’clock, the people began to assemble in chapel, some of them coming from a considerable distance. At half-past nine the place was quite full, and Mr. Beck then conducted service with much power and in a manner fit greatly to edify and benefit the people, who their part also gave evidence of their earnestness. At three in the afternoon there was another service, which I conducted; after this a large number of the people, such as live far away from Rosendorf, assembled in the pastor’s room for conversation, when the pastor gave them each in their turn a religious comfort or advice, as their cases might require. After this, those who live a long way off left for their respective homes. The pastor, along with another portion of his flock (such as live in the village), took a walk, during which also a most useful conversation was carried on. Besides this, one or two old men were called on in their houses, and in the evening a considerable number met again in the chapel, but at a farmer’s, where the pastor read to them some of the latest accounts from the fields of mission. A few hymns were sung and prayer offered at this meeting, at which all dispersed, it having already become rather late.”

RUSSIA.

A COMMUNITY OF PROTESTANTS ON THE SHORES OF THE CASPIA

The following interesting statement has been received through the Secretary to the Evangelical Alliance:—

Allow me to address you in reference to a large company of believing Christians in Schemachi, the principal town of Schirwan, a province of Russia on the shores of the Caspian. It is several years since these brethren came to our knowledge, by means of Nestorians who had gone there to ply their trades as carpenters and masons; and we have been happy to keep up a correspondence with them, and occasionally to send them books. The accounts we have received of their simple faith, humble piety, and patient perseverance in the Christian life under severe persecutions, have awakened our tenderest sympathy and regard, and we have watched their struggles, relying as they do upon the blessing of God on their now unaided efforts, with liveliest interest. They have never asked of material aid, but our prayers and sympathy and our influence with those in authority, exercised legitimately and wisely. The appearance recently among us of one of those Nestorian mechanics has renewed and increased the interest we previously felt.

More than thirty years ago two Christian missionaries came to Schusha Karabagh, preached among Armenians and Mussulmans there. This is not far from Schemachi. They printed the Scriptures, and opened schools for Armenians and Mussulmans. But by the position of the Armenians, complaints were made, and they were expelled the country. Since the Armenian youth of Schemachi who had visited hem, and become interested in this new way, egged to go with the missionaries. Accordingly, they took him to Basle, where he studied eight years in the university, adding to his other acquirements that of several languages. The good brethren of the Missionary Society then enjoined upon him the duty of returning to his native place, for the purpose of labouring in the gospel. He returned to Schirwan, and obtained permission of the authorities to open a school, and soon had one hundred and fifty scholars; at the same time he had over four hundred. The labours of the German missionaries had not been forgotten, and seed sown by them soon began to spring up, under the nurturing care of the young Vartabet, and he soon had a congregation of a hundred. But he dared not preach in the church, nor in his own house. His hearers were accustomed to resort to the adjacent mountains on the Sabbath for preaching, prayer, and the study of God's Word; stationing one of their number to watch the approach of any who might come with evil intent, and to give timely warning. Yet they did not dare to absent themselves from the morning and evening services in the old church, as thereby suspicion would be aroused.

About fourteen years ago some of the principal and most bigoted Armenians complained to the bishop and chief men of the church, charging the Vartabet of being a deceiver and stirrer up of sedition. The matter was brought to the notice of the Armenian Patriarch in Tiflis, who ordered him to appear before him. The Vartabet went alone, and after a three days' delay, was called privately into his presence. The Patriarch said to him, "Why are you deceiving my people?" Sarkis took out his New Testament and laid it before the Patriarch, and said, "Cursed is the man who speaks contrary to this book, and cursed be he who seeks to conceal these precious truths." After a long interview, the Patriarch said, "I perceive you are a true man; and now, my son, as an old man, whose days are nearly ended, I entreat you not to weary me with disturbances which will arise from your preaching. I know this is God's work, and that it will succeed; but, for God's sake, spare me the excitement and annoyance which will result from your teachings. Go to your home, teach your family, but do not assemble the people for preaching. Let me be in peace till I die; after that, God be with you."

The Vartabet returned to Schirwan, and still continued to teach and to preach, till five years since, when the company of believers had increased and become strong by the addition of many prominent and wealthy men, who encouraged the Vartabet, telling him not to fear what man could do. At this time he held his meeting in his very large school-room, where hundreds met to hear the Word of God. He carefully prepared his sermons, and preached twice on the Sabbath. Three years since the Armenians complained again to the present Patriarch, who was then in Tiflis, and who summoned the Vartabet to appear before him. Sarkis took five prominent men, and went to the house of the German pastor, who sent word to the chief officer of the Governor-General that Sarkis had come. This officer was a German, and friendly to the Vartabet, and told him not to fear, but to speak boldly, promising to send him with him to the Patriarch in the morning.

The Armenians in that quarter of the city laid a plot to waylay the Vartabet and kill him when he should go out, but a guard accompanied him and his companions. The Patriarch said to the Vartabet, "Why are you sowing tares among the wheat and creating disturbances among my people?" Sarkis replied, "I teach no heresy; were I to do so, I should deserve the just judgment of God." The Patriarch, however, was very angry, and said to him, "You will see what I will do to those who have learned to eat meat, to despise the saints, to disregard the traditions of the Fathers, and neglect the holy churches." The Vartabet replied, "When we depart from the law of Christ or change His words, do not hesitate to punish us." After some more violent words from the Patriarch, the Vartabet said, "You sit in the seat of Peter; you should not revile us, but instruct us concerning what we do not know. You speak words unworthy one in your position." When the brethren left under their escort of soldiers, the Armenians, who had crowded about the door, cried out to the Patriarch, "If you intend to judge these men, do so; if not, hand them over to us, and we will judge them." They gnashed on them with their teeth as they passed out, but dared not touch them, from fear of the guard. The brethren stopped again at the house of the German pastor, while the guard remained over the house, lest the Armenians should harm them. They were dismissed by the German officer, who told them, "Go to your home; by the grace of God your cause will succeed." By night they took carriages, and the Lord favouring them by a fearful storm, so that no one ventured out to intercept them, they arrived in safety in Schirwan. They found that the brethren had observed a week of fasting and prayer in their behalf. After their return, the Patriarch wrote to Schirwan, commanding his people to account these men accused, and to have no more dealings with them. From this time persecution was violent; their wives and children were stoned in the streets, and they were watched and stoned as they dispersed at night from the place of prayer. Complaint was finally made to the authorities, who punished a few of the offenders, and for a time they were unmolested. But they have not been allowed to meet for worship from that time till the present. They united in a petition to the Emperor, who is represented as being surprised to find so large a number so firmly united in this thing. He is reported as saying, "Let every one who wishes to enter into the Lutheran Church petition for himself and family only to that effect." At one time an officer came to Schirwan, sent by the Emperor's brother, to look after affairs, but the Armenians bribed him and procured new restrictions upon the brethren. He, however, soon left, and a new governor came, who called the brethren and told them all would be right in the end, but said, "The prince requests that you will not preach your doctrine openly until an answer comes from the Emperor."

Their dead are refused the burial service, and are not allowed a place near the graves of their fathers; their children are refused baptism, and their youth the marriage rite, and they are forbidden the Lord's Supper, and to meet in companies exceeding three or four. They had determined again to petition the Emperor, but heard that his brother was on his way to Schir-

wan. There is a German officer of high rank in St. Petersburg, who has interested himself much for these brethren. He advised them to make a strong effort to obtain some relief from the Archduke when he should be in Schemachi. Accordingly, they prepared their petition, but the Armenians made every effort to keep them from seeing the prince. But the prince's host, who was a Mussulman of much note, and very friendly to the Vartabet, contrived to admit by a private door three of the brethren to the presence of the prince's chief officer. This officer is also a German. One of the three brethren admitted holds an office of some importance under the Government, and his name was inquired for, when he stepped forward and spoke in behalf of the brethren. The wife of the Archduke, who is a German princess, hearing the conversation, came in. As she entered the brethren threw themselves at her feet with loud weeping. She bade them arise and cease weeping, saying, "I promise to do what I can for you." She further said, "I see no fault in you; you need an ordained minister to officiate for you. Do not the Lutherans know your need?" They replied, "Five of our number have studied at Basle, and are ready to take orders, if there were only permission." She told them to prepare a petition for the prince, promising to see him in their behalf in the morning. This interview was at midnight. Their petition was presented to the prince; but when the young man who informs us left, an answer had not been received. Should it not be favourable, three of the brethren are ready to go to St. Petersburg. For the past three years the brethren have had no regular service and no preaching, but have assembled in companies of three or four for prayer and mutual edification. There is permission for every one, however, to read the Scriptures in his own house, and pray with his family. The Vartabet prepares a sermon twice a-week, which is read in these little circles in rotation. In this way he tries to supply the place of a preaching service.

This community have been accustomed to turn up collections weekly for their necessary expenses. One of their number is appointed to attend to this matter and keep the accounts, each according to his ability, giving every Saturday night. Six persons are set apart to see to proper distribution of the contributions; a part goes to the poor, and a part to defray expenses incurred by their civil necessities. It is business also of these six deacons to assist the brethren in finding employment.

Their great need is a formal recognition with permission to have and enjoy the rites and ordinances of the Church of Christ. Our informant reports that there is scarcely a village in Schirwan, Mussulman or Christian, where there are not found persons awakened and inquiring. Many have received the truth as it is in Jesus. There are four or five hundred families in the city who are in sympathy with these brethren; but only about two hundred souls can be said to be hopefully renewed. They are all in anxious suspense, waiting to see what the Lord will do for them. Were religious liberty accorded to them, hundreds are ready openly to avow themselves as Evangelical.

I know not that these brethren would desire at present any foreign intervention on their behalf, at least till they know the result of their petition; but we deem it well to lay these facts before you, and we do know that they earnestly desire an interest in the prayers of all God's people. So, commending them to your fraternal sympathies and prayers, I remain, yours in the Gospel, in behalf of the American missionaries to the Nestorians, G. W. COAN.

BURMAH.

MISSIONARY EFFORT AMONG THE MOUNTAINEERS.

North of Toungoo.

... I started for the mountains one month earlier than last year, but it was too early to go far. It rained almost every day on the mountains, while a part of the day the sun was very hot, and the nights were very cold—a season most productive of fever. My most efficient native preacher was prostrated, but I was graciously preserved. I visited six villages. Found the young disciples baptized by me in May, last year, fifty-five in number, belonging to several villages, steadfast in the faith, and the truth had manifestly made progress among the heathen.

The village of Ryah-Maing—a heathen village, whose chief begged of me to give him a teacher at the beginning of the rains—seems to me to be turning to the Lord en masse. They all come together for worship, bow themselves in prayer to God, and declare themselves believers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

They bring forth fruit meet for repentance and faith in the Lord Jesus, so far as I can see in my short stay among them; and a young teacher—a mere stripling, a lad nineteen or twenty years of age—has been greatly blessed in his labours. I was afraid to send him, on account of his extreme youth, but I could send no other, and the chief would not be denied. I did not call him a preacher, but sent him up as a teacher, to teach the people to read, and requested him to read the Bible to them and with them, and pray much with them and for them, but I told him, when the Lord's-day came, to tell the people with him to a village two miles distant, where I had stationed a more experienced man. But after the people had heard him, at evenings, read and expound the Scriptures, they said, "What need have we to go to our neighbours? We have a preacher of our own. Let us stay at home." They asked him to preaching, and the Lord helped him;

the work really astonishes me—even where the Lord has done, and is still doing, wondrous things.

The weather was so unpropitious, I did go on to Boghee, Neeghgau and Shwa-nan-gau, in Geckho Proper, but some of the people came down to meet me; among the number, the Chief of Shwa-nan-ghee, where we had our greatest trouble last year, where we were surrounded by the mob, armed to the teeth, and ready to take our lives. I have a letter there, the people are learning to read, have abandoned many of their vices, meet regularly for worship (in the evening), and are making sure progress in the knowledge of the Bible. Oh that they may be taught of God! Some of them will be; some of them appear to be. The teacher, who has lived and mingled with them for months, thinks that some of them do really believe in Jesus their Saviour; but they are very ignorant, very wild, very rude, very dark. I shrink from a hasty reception; still, God's work is like men's work. He creates with a word; he speaks it, and it is done.

I had conceived the idea of getting up a meeting of camp-meeting for the benefit of these people, calling together as many as possible of the neighbouring tribes for a meeting of some days. I suggested the plan to this chief. He said at once, "Teacher, it will be very good, it will be very good." "But where shall we meet?" I asked. "Why, at my village, of course," was his earnest reply. "But it will cost something; there must be tents made?" "Oh, my people will make them, and we have an excellent place by a running stream, between two mountains." "But it will cost something to feed strangers?" "Oh, I can feed a thousand, I can feed a thousand; rice is very plentiful on the mountains this year." "Well, how shall we notify the people all around; the Geckhos, the Saukoos, the Breca, the Harshives, and the Padoungs?" "Why, soon I shall finish reaping my paddy, and then I will send my people in all directions, and a great multitude will come." "Will Boghee and Neeghgau (two influential chiefs) come?" "Oh yes! they are sure to come." He then bethought himself, and said, "Boghee is very old and infirm; he may not be able to come; but his people will come," &c. So I arranged for the meeting at the full of the moon, and the chief returned. In three or four days I go up again for two or three months' labour.

MOSES H. BIXBY.

AMERICA.

AMERICAN CHURCHES IN VIEW OF THEIR NEW RESPONSIBILITIES—THE PRESBYTERIAN ASSEMBLIES.

Affairs in America are rapidly adapting themselves to the new condition of peace. Last week the final and most formal notice was taken of Mr. Lincoln's death; and the day of Humiliation was observed with a solemnity and heartiness which proved that the fund of the nation's affection for its late President had not been exhausted nor even dried. This week, one of the largest and most enthusiastic mass-meetings ever known among us has attested the confidence of our citizens in the ability and in the policy of Johnson. The transition is thus effected; we feel somewhat as merchants do when a change is made in the firm, and a new set of books is opened. The administration of war gives place to that of peace.

The Church is fully awake to the responsibilities and opportunities of these new times. Every denomination is projecting special efforts for the evangelization of the colored elements that, for a while at least, we make up Southern society. No one doubts that there has been a great deal of religious intelligence and true piety among both masters and slaves. But in the new relations which these are to sustain to each other it is manifest that what religious life belongs to either party will need the kindest and most judicious fostering to save it from destruction. Moreover, a great body of fortune-seekers, of every sort, will rapidly overrun and fill up the South; and we see distinctly that nothing but the Gospel can cement this heterogeneous material into symmetry and strength. The Presbyterian General Assemblies, Old and New School, have just held their annual meetings at Pittsburgh and Brooklyn. Some seceded Presbyterians in Tennessee formally sought a re-union with the latter of these bodies, their return being celebrated with tearful thanksgivings. Large schemes have been devised by both Assemblies for the instruction of the freedmen. And the New School body carried its interest for them so far as to vote unanimously in favour of their right of suffrage.

In the Old School Assembly, among other decisive indications of the purpose of that Church to secure to the emancipated slaves the largest opportunities of intellectual culture, there was presented from John A. Jacobs, Esq., of Danville, Ky., an offer to place 5,000 dollars at the disposal of the Assembly for the education of the coloured men and their training for the ministry, but it was his desire that the institution should be located in one of what were lately known as the "Slave" States.

THE AMERICAN HAVELock—THE NORTH AND SOUTH.

You know, probably, of the erection of a Freedmen's Bureau at Washington. General Howard, whose outspoken and consistent piety has gained him the highest esteem of the nation, has been placed at its head. When at the late review in Washington the multitude responded heartily to a call for three cheers for "the Havelock of the War," it was somewhat grotesque to see this modest general compelled to recognise the title, and, like other generals who had been called out by name, to rise and bow his thanks. In his hands the freedmen are sure of the wisest and kindest Christian care. His catholic spirit will welcome and second the judicious efforts which any church or society may make in their behalf: and if God shall spare his life or give him worthy successors, a very few years will put the problem of the capacity of the negro race into such a course of solution as has never been possible before.

Both Assemblies have taken strong ground against those Southern clergymen who have approved and aided the rebellion. In response to an overture signed by many respectable ministers and elders, which represented treason as "a most grievous sin against God, as well as the highest crime against the State," and asked "upon what terms ministers who have been guilty of treason should, if at all, be received" by the Presbyterians, the New School Assembly "advised the presbyteries not to admit them, nor in any way recognise them as ambassadors of the Cross of Christ, until they have given satisfactory evidence that they have sincerely repented of their sins." It is not easy to see how the Assemblies could avoid all action on this subject, and yet one can hardly help fearing that what they have done will greatly increase that jealousy of Northern churches and ministers which, at the best, must for a long while greatly impede their success at the South. An idea of the strength of the existing prejudice may be gained from the report of a very respectable Northern minister, who has recently returned from an attempt to establish a Congregational Church in New Orleans. He states that, finding no suitable place for worship, he was offered by one of our generals a "Secession church" to preach in; but declined to use it, since the citizens would count such use "a kind of robbery." So as his observation went, he describes the people as "bitterly hostile to Northern preachers and Northern ideas." There is evidently a great deal of patient, wise work to be done before the whole South will accept the Gospel from our lips.

UNION AND DISUNION.

The effort to reunite the two branches of the Presbyterian Church has not been pursued in the Assemblies. The first glow of feeling, which two or three years ago seemed to announce an immediate restoration of old relations, is followed now by a serious but moderate newspaper discussion of real difficulties in the way. This discussion, of course, could not be evaded, and will doubtless be preparing the churches for ultimate union. Next year the two Assemblies will meet at the same time in the city of St. Louis. If there be warmth enough to fuse them, the two masses will be near enough to run together; but so early a result is hard to be anticipated.

No little comment has been excited within the last fortnight by a pastoral letter of Bishop Potter, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Your readers will remember a statement concerning the preaching of our eminent Presbyterian divines in an Episcopal pulpit. We are reminded now that some time ago a similar courtesy was extended to Rev. Dr. Schaff, of the German Reformed Church, who preached to a congregation of Germans in another Episcopal church. Greek service in Trinity Chapel will have been forgotten by you. Now, Bishop Potter, who approved the last-named service and consented to the second, has published a long and elaborate pastoral, in which he questions the Prayer-book and the Canons of the Church to prove that the Greek service was allowable, and that both the other were illegal, and contrary to the ordination of every bishop, priest, and deacon of the Episcopal Church. He suggests, moreover, "that the ministers of other religious bodies will not long find it consistent with their respect to avail themselves of concessions which can be proffered only by a few, and through a violation of engagements generally deemed sacred."

Both the law and the spirit of this pastoral have been sharply criticised by the organ of Evangelical party of the Bishop's own case. And a circular letter, understood to have been written by Dr. Muhlenbergh, one of the most eminent and venerable of his presbytery, distinctly charges the Bishop with ascending his office in judging and condemning individual ministers who have in any way been brought to trial. Our non-Episcopal clergymen, for the most part, welcome

Bishop's definition of the policy of his party, feeling sure that the arrogant exclusiveness which he avows will not command the favour of our country or of these times. It is too soon to know whether the presbytery whom he warns and rebukes will admit to practice an interpretation of their canons which they regard as false and offensive.

THE RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES.

The close of the war has marked this year as a sort of epoch in the history of all of our benevolent societies; and the most of them have at their recent anniversaries some comprehensive statistics of their work, which will be well worth the small space in which I will repeat them.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions reports that in the fifty years of its existence 55,000 converts have been gathered into Christian churches, making an average of more than 1,000 a-year for all those years, and of more than 1,400 for the last fifteen years.

The American Bible Society reports the issue of nearly 2,000,000 of volumes in the last year; of more than 5,300,000 since the war began, and of 20,609,564 since its organization.

But in mere figures the American Tract Society distances all other benevolent bodies in this country. It has been in operation forty years, and has issued 20,000,000 of bound volumes, 90,000,000 of religious periodicals, and 250,000,000 of tracts.

Among the acts of the New School General Assembly was a vote of thanks to the New York Sabbath Committee for the gift to each minister of a copy of "Gilfillan on the Sabbath." The committee will soon have accomplished its great purpose of putting this suggestive book into the hands of all American pastors. Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, whose name I have incidentally mentioned above, is the secretary of this most respected and efficient committee. He sails for England in the same vessel which will carry this letter. His piety and ripe scholarship, his catholic spirit, and thorough acquaintance with the religious, political, and social interests of his adopted country, ought to secure general attention to any communications which he may make to the religious community of Great Britain or the Continent.

CONVOCATION.

The Convocation of the province of Canterbury was still in session when our June number went to press. The two Houses had agreed to petition the Crown for leave to amend the canons in conformity with the new form of clerical subscription, which has been agreed to by both Houses of Parliament, but we may remark that no answer to their application has yet been received from the Queen's Ministers. Both Houses were engaged in lengthened debates on the subject of a reform of Convocation. It was admitted on all hands that Convocation had no inherent right to reform itself; and the Bishop of Peterborough seemed to doubt whether even the Crown could constitutionally confer upon it such a right; he therefore proposed that an address should be presented to the Queen praying her to take the opinion of the judges of the law upon the subject; but the suggestion was not pressed, as the majority did not doubt that the Queen had full power to authorise the reform. An address to the Crown praying for the requisite liberty was therefore agreed to; and, supposing that liberty should be obtained, the following propositions were laid down as the basis on which the reform should proceed:—

1. That in future all the proctors of the parochial clergy should be elected directly and freely by the beneficed clergy, and by each curate licensed to the cure of the parish of a non-resident incumbent.

2. That each diocese of the province should return the numbers of proctors for the clergy allotted to them in the following schedule, that is to say: Canterbury 5, London 6, Winchester 6, Bangor 2, Bath and Wells 5, Chichester 4, Ely 6, Exeter 6, Gloucester and Bristol 6, Hereford 4, Lichfield 6, Lincoln 6, Llandaff 2, Norwich 6, Oxford 6, Peterborough 6, Rochester 6, Salisbury 6, St. Asaph 2, St. David's 3, Worcester 6—making 105.

Several members in the Lower House ad-

In the end, the report of a committee, drawn up by Archdeacon Denison, and stigmatising the "conscience clause" as a breach of the original agreement made with the Church in 1839 and 1840, was agreed to, though not without considerable opposition.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF CHESTER.

The Right Rev. Dr. Graham, Bishop of Chester, died, at the palace of his see, on Thursday, the 15th ult., in the 71st year of his age. He was a native of Durham, was ordained in 1818, and in 1830 became Master of Christ's College, Cambridge, in the room of Dr. Kaye, appointed Bishop of Lincoln. In 1833 he married the daughter of the Rev. R. Porteus, and granddaughter of Beilby Porteus, first Bishop of Chester, and afterwards Bishop of London. In 1843 he was made rector of Willingham, Cambridgeshire, and in 1841 chaplain to the late Prince Consort, having acted as the energetic chairman of his Royal Highness's committee in the memorable Cambridge contest for the Chancellorship. In 1848, on the translation of Dr. John Bird Sumner to the See of Canterbury, Dr. Graham was nominated Bishop of Chester. He is said to have been installed on the 15th June, 1848 ; thus, to a day, making precisely seventeen years from his installation to his demise. In the administration of his diocese Dr. Graham proved himself a worthy successor of the amiable and excellent prelate

INNOVATIONS IN THE CHURCH

The later sessions of the of the Church of Scotland, marked by a very curious discussion on certain changes creeping into the mode of worship in the Presbyterian Church. The question was raised by "overtures," as they are called, which were complaints made by several of the presbyteries, and the innovations at were : 1st, changed posture kneeling instead of standing ; 2nd, the use of instrumental music ; 3rd, the use of quasi liturgical private dispensation of the two latter were more particularly the opponents of change. The question of the expediency of the changes, was the question of the constitutional right of congregation to make them. The changed posture already found their way into be disturbed. The object of the overtures was to obtain a more distinct expression from the Assembly in disapprobation of these changes, or at least of the method taken of introducing them—namely, at the will of particular congregations, instead of, according to Presbyterian usage, obtaining the assent of their ecclesiastical superiors.

These overtures were supported by Dr. Pirie, Professor of Divinity in the University of Aberdeen, in a speech of considerable length, in which he strongly condemned and ridiculed the innovations alluded to, expressing his opinion that they were only introduced to tickle the fancies of careless people. Such systems, he said, may continue or may grow; but so long as the Church retains a high spiritual tone, the desire for them will not be felt. He had never yet known a Church fixedly spiritual in character begin gradually to have a great tendency to sentimentalism and sensualism in forms, that was not diminishing at the same time in spiritual-mindedness. Dr. Pirie moved a resolution declaring that the introduction into congregations of changes on the long-established forms of worship without the authority of Church Courts, and under the pretence of congregational independence, was inconsistent with the principles of Presbyterian Church government, and might not only bring the Church into collision with the civil courts, but prove subversive of the Presbyterian constitution; and, while recommending the utmost tenderness to the feelings of unanimous congregations as to matters of form, enacting that all such arrangements should be regulated by the presbytery of the bounds, whose decisions should be absolute until and unless finally reversed by the Assembly; and the General Assembly strictly prohibit all ministers and office-bearers from assuming independent jurisdiction in such matters as are inconsistent with the vows of submission pledged by them at ordination to the inferior courts, on pain of the highest censures; and in the event of disobedience, the General Assembly further authorise and enjoin Presbyteries to proceed with and prosecute such censures to such conclusions as may seem essential for restoring the peace and asserting the constitution of the Church.

Professor Stevenson, Edinburgh University, proposed a resolution practically repeating the deliverance of last Assembly, and expressly leaving such "matters of secondary importance" as the attitudes and music to be regulated by kirk sessions, subject to complaint to the presbyteries.

The innovators found a warm supporter in Dr. Norman McLeod, of Glasgow, who ridiculed the idea of the Church being bound by the opinions of what were called the Fathers of the Church; and asked what would be thought in the year 2,000, if members of the Assembly of that day should be found quoting him or any of his brethren as a "Father." He denied that the innovations showed any tendency to Popery, or even to Episcopacy; on the contrary, he believed they had a strong tendency to strengthen the attachment of the body to the Presbyterian form of worship. Dr. Lee, of Edinburgh, also defended the innovations he had made, and stated that the practice of privately rebuking offenders and reading sermons were as much innovations as those he had introduced; yet he defied the Assembly to return to the old forms in these respects. Notwithstanding these appeals, the feeling of the Assembly against these changes was very plainly expressed, and in the end the motion of Dr. Pirie was affirmed by a majority of 173 against 140.

THE NEW ROMISH ARCHBISHOP.

Dr. Manning was consecrated Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, which office he holds by special grace of the Pope, on the 5th ult., in the chapel at Moorfields, where a few weeks before he had preached the funeral sermon of his predecessor, Cardinal Wiseman. The ecclesiastical dignitaries of his Church were all present to give dignity and grandeur to the occasion; and, as might be expected in a religion so highly sensuous, nothing that would impress the senses was wanting to the ceremony. There was, however, a marked absence of the Roman Catholic aristocracy from the service, especially of those who may be denominated hereditary Catholics. Of these last, we believe Lord Petre was the only representative. The "converts," of course, were in ecstasies at the high honour that has befallen their brother "convert." On the following Sunday the Archbishop issued his first pastoral, which was read from all the pulpits. In it he anticipates a golden future for the Romish faith in England. He says:—

Since the end of the last century there has been a profound re-awakening of the minds of men. Men are looking about for a guide in the way of salvation; for a teacher to whom they may entrust their souls; for a Church which knows what it means, and means what it says; for a hierarchy which is not divided; for a keeper of Holy Writ who guards every jot and every tittle of the sacred books ; for an interpreter who does not contradict himself ; for pastors who, day by day, in all the world, absolve sinners in the confessional, but require confession of sin by a divine and universal law as a condition of absolution ; for a deep, interior, Evangelical life after the pattern of the Gospel, when men, taking Jesus at His word, sold all that they had and followed their Master ; for a religion which is one and the same in every place and in every nation under heaven ; in perfect harmony with itself, the Scriptures and common religion these are another prejudice just justified by English midst system

To ever, involves great risk and expense, the stranger brought heavy sums to be allowed to pass. Mr. Zeller was sent by mail in the Jebel Ajtûm, though he afterwards recovered. By several of the Sheikhs he was hospitably entertained, he was listened to with attention as he set forth the claims of a "man of rare intelligence," whose "house is a museum of remnants of truly patriarchal customs and virtues. The Nestorian mission of the American Board has suffered an irreparable loss by the death of the Rev. Austin H. Wright, M.D., who expired at Oroomiah, from typhoid fever, after a missionary career of twenty-five years, of which more than twenty were spent in Persia. His labours were great and varied, and his surviving colleagues speak of him in high terms, as "a preacher, a physician, a coadjutor in the department of the mission press, and last, not least, as an effective shield to succour the poor oppressed Nestorians, standing as a dayman between them and the Mohammedans, by whom he was profoundly respected."

INDIA.

The Free Church missionaries at Calcutta report the baptism of a young man, a student at their educational institution, whose case is remarkable at once on account of his character and attainments, his former prejudice against Christianity, and the mental struggles through which he passed before avowing his discipleship. On his leaving his school in the country, his teacher warned him against becoming a pupil in the Free Church Institution, saying, "If you join Dr. Duff's school, most probably you will become a Christian." This he kept in remembrance, and was careful not to give any attention to the study of the Bible, until health forced religious subjects upon his attention. Then a tract, entitled, "A Compilation from the Precepts of Jesus," by Rajah Rammohun Roy, was eagerly perused by him. To his surprise, he learned from a friend that the whole contents of this tract and very much more were to be found in the Bible. Then he began the earnest study of the Word of God, which, after much mental conflict, and the vain endeavour to find peace of soul in Paganism, resulted in his conversion. Of this convert, Mothuranath Basu, the Rev. Mr. Fyfe writes: "He is the holder of a first-grade scholarship; and I have no doubt that, if spared and well, he will hold a high place at the next B.A. examination. The Brahmas cannot say in his case that he is of immature mind, and that none but such embrace Christianity. He has attained distinction in the university examinations, as well as a most distinguished place among his class-fellows in the institution. We take his case as another sure pledge at the cause of Christ will ultimately prevail in this long benighted land."

From the Free Church Mission at Nagpore accounts have been received of fourteen recent baptisms. Two were administered by the Rev. Mr. Cooper in the course of an evangelistic tour in the interior; four were at Kampti; and eight took place at Sitabaldi. Seven are men and three women. The case of one of them, Jankey Persad, a Kanoji Ahmin, presents some features of interest. After he had become convinced of the truth of Christianity, and while lying on a sick bed, he resolved to renounce heathenism:—

For several months after getting better [writes Mr. Cooper] he pondered the step he had resolved to take; but for a time his courage or faith failed. At length he became so uneasy in his mind that sleep went from him at night, and he began to lose appetite. In short, he felt the burden of his position to be so insupportable, that if he did not immediately follow the deep and settled convictions of his soul he would perish. Accordingly he came from Kampti and made known to me the whole of his case. He said he wished me to go back with him to Kampti, and aid for his father, that in my presence he might tell him of his resolution to become a Christian. After some conversation and prayer, we did so; but it proved a severe trial of courage and decision to Jankey, who, however, was calm and firm throughout, and never, for a moment, wavered from his purpose. His father, a venerable and stately-looking old man, was deeply distressed, and employed every method of coaxing and threatening to induce his son to return; but, but for my interference, would have proceeded to violence to accomplish his object. After nearly three hours' interview, the old man retired; but up to a late hour that evening crowds of angry and boisterous acquaintances beset the school-house. Before leaving my house in the forenoon, Jankey earnestly requested permission to break his caste by eating bread. I thought I might defer that step till after he had seen his father, but he said he felt so oppressively burdened by the thought of his position as a Brahman, that he longed to be free. After dining us in a light repast, he felt greatly relieved, and accompanied us back to Kampti. He said he had counted the cost of the course he was now pursuing, and acted not from impulse, but from deep conviction of the truth that Jesus was the Son of God, and the only Saviour of sinners; and having now made public his sentiments, he wished, without further delay, to be baptized. Accordingly next morning, at the close of our English service, Jankey came forward and witnessed a good confession before men. A goodly number of his schoolfellows, and a few of his relatives were present, and heard his replies to my questions, all of which were very satisfactory, and some of them very touching. Before the ordinance was administered, in the presence of the whole assembly, Jankey took off his janwa, or sacred string, and gave it to me, which seemed a reply to affect some of his heathen relatives present. He was then baptized. After the service was ended, a number of European friends (officers and others) came forward and shook him very warmly by the hand, congratulating him on the noble stand he had made on the Lord's side.

Two adults, a man of thirty-five years of age and a woman of forty, have also been baptized by the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, of the Free Church mission at Poonah.

The present state of the Punjab, in a religious point of view, is of deep interest. Attention is being specially directed to the Sikhs, although they number but about 1 million, while the entire population of the Punjab approaches twenty millions. It is only does the manliness of their character and their adaptation for native agency attract notice of the missionaries, but their religion is dying out. The British conquest brought power, not only of the Sikh rule, but of the Sikh creed. "Other religious systems," it is told, "are still vigorous enough to proselytise, and aware that the Sikh religion is dead come like vultures to feed upon the carcase. It is astonishing how many native itine are at work in the Manjha, diligently endeavouring to gain Sikhs over to some of various forms of Hindooism. The old Sikhs are dying out; the new Sikhs initiate but few; and the children of Sikhs become Hindoos." Precisely at this juncture, Christianity is introduced by the missionaries. They are so few in number, and the sphere of labour is so extensive, that one mode of operation is available—that of itineration. (them, an agent of the Church Missionary Society, writes :—

My plan, when reaching any village, has been to send a salaam to the lambaridar or headman to find out his house, and then adjourn with him to the village dharmasala or gati, a peepul tree musjid, and wait for the people to collect. My seat has more frequently been the roof of or straw matting, unless the villagers brought a charpoy (bedstead). The people seem glad to welcome me, though an utter stranger in the majority of cases. The avidity with which the people receive and read our books is remarkable. A large number were sold or otherwise disposed of. Our thanks are indeed due to the Loodiana mission.

Although, during the thirteen years that have elapsed since the Church Missionary Society established their mission at Umritsur, there have been but few conversions there are only some 416 communicants throughout the Punjab—

A great foundation work has been accomplished: the language of the Punjabees has been acquired; the missionaries are no longer strangers; the people in the vicinity of the mission stations become familiarised with their presence and their labours; they purchase books, listen to their addresses delivered at the bazaars, at the melas, in their villages; they begin to know the distinctive truths of Christianity, and to converse about them; there is but little opposition, the instances being rare in which the missionary is not kindly received. Little of Christian natives have been raised up here and there. They are very small, yet they have y to the missionaries several valuable and persevering helpers, one of whom is in holy orders acts as pastor to the native flock at Umritsur, while others help in schools, or itinerate with the missionary. In short, the leaven has been introduced into the lump, small indeed in bulk but genuine in quality.

The Rev. E. Sargent, of the Tinnevely Church mission, mentions some accessions to his flock at Palamcottah. One case is that of a young man who had been for awhile in the Palamcottah Native-English School.

His father was a kind of general merchant. One day a man brought some old paper books to his stall, and offered to sell them as waste paper. Among the books thus brought was an English Bible, the binding of which was in good condition. The father took the book, thinking that it might be better cared for than if left in the stores. He knew nothing of English but it was not long in the house before the son saw it, and then followed the reading and the power of it. This was, in time, blessed to his increase in knowledge and a desire to become a Christian. But now various obstacles rose up before him. "If," thought he, "I propose myself as a Christian now, there are many who will say that I did so in order to get some employment must therefore first get employment, and then act upon my convictions." In a short time he got an appointment in a Government office, but now a new objection arose. You are a Christian, if you become a Christian what will you do for a wife? If you marry after becoming a Christian people will say that you became a Christian with the object of marrying in some irregular way. He therefore determined to wait, and marry according as his father should arrange. This accomplished, and now he found he had a greater difficulty than any as yet contended with. He could not grieve his wife by the adoption of a course which, with her views, she could not appreciate. What if she refused to accompany him? These cares bore heavily on his mind, but he set his heart earnestly to the business on which his heart was fixed, and by kindly and prayerfully pleading before his wife the excellency and love of Christ, gradually won her over to the same views: now, every obstacle removed, he came over boldly, and cast in his lot among the Christians of the hood. One day, during his absence at office, relatives came and forced her to go away with them supposing that this would oblige him to give up his intentions. But as it did not effect this, no strict coercion being laid on her, she in a short time found opportunity to rejoin her husband and affirmed that nothing on her part should separate her from him.

On the day appointed for the baptism of the husband, the wife was also present and expecting to be baptized.

I suggested [writes the missionary] that she had not yet learnt the required lessons of catechumens. She replied, with an anxious look, and with the mildest and most beseeching voice that she knew about Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world, and that, as to lessons, could not learn them afterwards? Was it not a good thing that she was now desiring? This was an ected event, and for the moment, I hardly knew what to do. However, in the presence of the congregation I asked her questions on the great truths of the Gospel, and as she gave a fair reply these, and affirmed that it was the fixed desire and determination of her heart to live as a true child of the Lord Jesus Christ, I felt my course clear, in the face of the congregation, to admit her husband and wife into the Christian covenant.

While cholera was prevailing at Kulwun, in the valley of Kandeish (Western India), the people, in their panic and despair, asked a Manjin—a woman of the lowest Hindoo caste, and who, on such awful visitations, is made to personify the goddess Cholera—what they should do to induce the cholera to depart from their village.

In reply, she said, if you sacrifice to the cholera two human beings, she will leave the village, and go somewhere else. The awe-stricken people actually caught two old men, and imprisoned them, with the intention of putting them to death, in order to appease the anger of the goddess Cholera. Providentially, one of the intended victims managed by night to escape out of his confinement, and take refuge in the collector's tent, which was pitched at no great distance from the village. The poor man reported all that had happened to the collector, who immediately investigated the matter, and commanded the instant release of the other intended victim.

The Lucknow Church Missionary Association held its fifth anniversary in April last. In the report presented on the occasion by the Rev. J. P. Menge, that gentleman said: "There are a few well-educated natives in Lucknow who feel, I trust, not merely convinced of the truth of Christianity, as far as the intellect is concerned, but who are also persuaded that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the world, but who are not yet able to confess the truth before their friends, relations, and acquaintances." The Rev. Mr. Reuther also spoke, in his report, of the interest shown in matters of religion by the learned Mohammedans of Lucknow. They have diligently read the Holy Scriptures," said he, "with a view of being able to prove from them that the Koran is the Word of God, but their hopes have not been realised. Doubts respecting Mohammed and his mission are gaining ground among them. Some time since the zealous among them got up a preaching party in the streets of Lucknow, which was carried on with vigour for some months. Islam was struggling for existence by the side of the Gospel. The movement was not according to the customs of their religion. But they felt the influence which the preaching of the missionaries has upon the masses, and for this reason they adopted it."

The last tabular view of the mission of the American Board in Ceylon shows the addition of thirty members to the church during the year.

MADAGASCAR.

The two agents of the Church Missionary Society in Vohimare, on the north-east coast of Madagascar, although kindly received by the governor and the people, have been kept in tedious suspense while awaiting the permission of the Queen to reside there permanently. They had taken many opportunities, however, of reading the Scriptures to the people and conversing with them, on spiritual topics, both at Hiarana, where they landed, and Amboanio. In both places they have devoted much time to teaching from house to house. One of them writes from Amboanio: "I find I have a great deal to learn yet. I know nothing of the Hova language, but nothing of the Sakalava, or Betsimisaraka. The Europeans here are in the minority, and we are debarred, for the present, from doing much with them, as they nearly all live in the rova, or citadel, which we are not permitted to enter. The Sakalavas appear to be really a fine race, and many of them are anxious to learn. They are perhaps the most numerous tribe in the whole country, almost twice as numerous as the Hovas. They might be called the Saxons of Madagascar, while the Hovas might be properly termed the Normans. If several of the Sakalavas were really converted and sent among their own people, blessed results might follow."

EASTERN AFRICA.

Six young Africans—two married couples and two girls engaged to native Christians of their own land—having received a Christian education at Bombay, have been sent to the East African Coast, and have joined the Rev. Mr. Rebmann, at the Kisuludini station of the Church Missionary Society. These young persons are the first-fruits from among the educated slaves of East Africa. Before their departure, the Governor of Bombay and Lady Seaton, at an interview with which they were favoured, expressed great interest in them, and presented to each of them an English Bible. Mr. Rebmann was greatly rejoiced to receive them. "The Mohammedans of Mombasa," we are told, "are astonished. They have before said that the poor Wanika converts were becoming superior to themselves. Now they meet

Vas River, the ground for which was given by M. Du Chaillu to the American at the Gaboon, and which has been recently occupied by a native assistant commenced.

The advantages of this point [writes the Rev. Mr. Preston], from which interior to the east, up the Nazareth and its branches, and to the south-east up can hardly be over-estimated. One branch of the Nazareth passes round the Gaboon eastward, and heads north of the equator, perhaps in the great lake of which I nenge, from a Pangwe, in June last. He came, he said, from the interior, a months' journey, from the western shore of a lake, respecting the north and south he knew nothing; could not see the east shore, and had never been there. Slave Apinji, and many other tribes beyond the Bakelle, can be found in the Gaboon, and ready to accompany and assist the missionary or explorer in their countries. I learn, the Fernand Vas is less unhealthy than the Gaboon. I have not known a malignant African fever among the half-dozen French, Scotch, and American who lived there.

Such is the field we have been called, in a providential manner, to occupy with buildings, and but five dollars per month for the teacher. M. du Chaillu had been for about a year, preparatory to another exploring tour into the interior, and assistance in forming a station, and his premises when he had no further use for them extensive enough for a station for white missionaries, built at an expense of money. I visited him in July, just as he was loading his last vessel and about starting. He then had an opportunity to sell his premises for a fair price, but he refused, and offer to our mission. I accepted conditionally, and on my return to Gaboon see there, take charge when M. Du Chaillu should leave, and make the trial of commerce. He has been there more than four months, and has succeeded beyond our expect

BRITISH AMERICA.

A communication reaches us from the remote regions of the Mackenzie North-West of British America. The writer is the Rev. W. W. Kirkby, of the Missionary Society, stationed at Fort Simpson. In the course of his letter

There are no other Evangelical churches within 2,000 miles of us. Not only labourers near with whom we might take counsel, or exchange words of comfort, but have active enemies around us to oppose. Rome has her agents here—a staff of a bishop at their head, are doing all they can to crush my work. They make no publicly assert that they will not leave in the district an inch of ground for Protestants upon—vain boast, still it is their boast—and they act consistently with their natives here under the sway of Popery are just as unimpressed with the great truth they were before the priests came. A religion, therefore, that bears no fruit cannot neither can it endure. This gives me comfort, and all the opposition that I meet with me, I trust, except to greater prayer and diligence in scattering abroad the precious to my care. But I need help. For four years I stood alone 1,600 miles in advancing River Mission. After that a dear brother joined me just as I had returned by a successful missionary tour among the Kutchin Indians of the Youcan, 1,500 miles and 1,000 miles beyond the reach of Rome. My dear brother hastened at once to da, Mr. Budd was bereaved of his wife, and then of a daughter. In each of these, which followed in rapid succession, there was hope. But the missionary's heart was fresh as he narrates them, and his desolate condition in the far-off wilds of America may well awaken our sympathy.

POLYNESIA.

The American Board publish letters from the Rev. Mr. Snow, of Micronesia, which give a gratifying view of religious progress, and the faithfulness and efficiency of converts and of other Christians, at Ebon, his present, and Kusaie, his former field. Eleven persons were received on one occasion to the church at Ebon. On his visit, it did his "eyes and heart good to see such a clean and well-dressed congregation, find a Sabbath-school "well regulated, orderly, and remarkably still;" to see something over sixty names were on their list of hopeful ones, more or less of them regarded as true converts to righteousness;" "to see how carefully," without a doubt they had kept up their church discipline;" and, in connexion with "a season of hallowed interest," to receive five persons to the church.

Literature.

the Blessing of the Gospel of Christ; a series of Lectures on the Eighth Chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Romans. By G. HOBSON. Jackson, Walford, Editor of the Epistle to the Romans for the Christian orator and divine. It is difficult for a good man to study it in its truths, and triumphant utterances of the apostle, without imbibing something of his spirit; and are therefore not surprised that Mr. Hobson, who follows with his theme, and often with great dignity and elevation. The lectures are in number, and treat the subject as well as in a practical manner.

of the text is generally just and varied important truths which come before us for the most part developed in a happy manner. In bringing out the author avails himself of the labours of the best recent commentators, and employs which is singularly transparent. His illustrations are appropriate. It is, happily pleased, also, to observe the practical lessons are deduced and explained. The book does not profess to be an intellectual profundity, of critical and scholastic erudition; but it is qualities which will cause it to arrest the attention, convey instruction, and to minister comfort. It is gratifying to meet in it the elements of thorough and lifelike disputation, duty, and consolation. We may heartily recommend it to our readers of interest, inform, and profit them.

and the Parish; or, The Minister as Pastor, Catechist, &c. By JOHN B. L. A Prize Essay. Partridge.

This book, in our estimation, combines the merits of such works as those of Mr. J. A. James, and Bridge, and others of like sterling character. He realises the fact that ministerial work is soul work, and not merely formal, ceremonial, and sacerdotal. The evangelists and apostles supply him with rules sufficient, without having recourse to the customs, canons, and opinions of the middle ages. His examples are, in like manner, furnished by the primitive heralds of our holy faith, or by the men who, in later ages, have most nearly conformed to the apostolic pattern. He wastes no time in idle and vapid denunciations of all churches but his own; on the contrary, he finds out what is best in various sections of the Christian community, and this he recommends and urges for adoption. He is, indeed, a model of generosity and candour, and rises far above party prejudices and sectarian animosity. With no knowledge of the essays produced by the other competitors for the prize which has been awarded to Mr. Heard, we cannot compare his work with theirs, but we can speak of his as a remarkably interesting and valuable book, and as one which is fitted to benefit many.

We cannot attempt to give anything like a full account of what has here been done, but we may rapidly indicate the subjects of the chapters. Among other points, the introduction dwells earnestly upon the importance of prayerful habits in a minister. The first chapter shows by examples what a devoted pastor may hope to accomplish. Here Bernard Gilpin, Richard Baxter, Joseph Alleine, Oberlin, Neff, and others, are introduced in an effective style. The second chapter treats of the pastoral office as illustrated by the Old Testament; and the third enters more fully into the question by the light of the New Testament. The fourth chapter is occupied with the pastor as a preacher; the fifth with the pastor in his visits; in the sixth he is regarded as a catechist; in the next as an evangelist; and in the eighth as "parson." A miscellaneous chapter con-of a Gospel minister, instead of losing himself among petty details, and of mixing up with pastoral duties priestly whims and disputed questions.

We generally agree with the opinions advanced, but here and there our assent must be modified. For example, the author can scarcely believe that ignorant people may be really sceptical. It is a fact that they are very prone to superstition, as he observes, but in most of the cities of England many of them are as decided sceptics and infidels as can well be found. It is also a fact that this low-class infidelity is constantly changing, and hence, in the great centres of population some of the able works recommended by Mr. Heard are already almost out of date. We have been assured by practical observers that atheism is the dominant form of infidelity among working men at this time; and that Mr. Gillespie's work on the Being of God is one which they are very anxious to avoid.

The remarks on Romanism seem to have been a little tinged by our author's Irish experience, but they will be all the more useful to the Irish clergy. These, however, are but items in a long account, and we lay down the work with thankfulness that God still has such faithful and able witnesses and monitors in the English Church, and expressing our devout aspiration that this small volume may be blessed in the greater zeal and efficiency of its ministerial readers, who will, we trust, be many.

FOREIGN.

THE events that have taken place in France during the past month are full of interest, and may yet exercise an important influence on the history of that country. The visit of the Emperor to his transmarine possessions in Algeria was accomplished without accident, and seems to have been productive both of renewed health to his person and of increased confidence in his reign. But during his absence two important circumstances occurred. In the first place, M. de Persigny, who had been making a stay of some two months at Rome, published a pamphlet descriptive of the impressions made upon him by his visit, which were by no means flattering to the present rulers or favourable to the durability of the temporal power. His opinion may be summed up in the one sentence, that, while the present Pope is an amiable and good man, he and his Government at Rome are in the hands of a knot of conspirators, who are at war with everything that can conduce to the liberty and the happiness of mankind. It is certain that among all the Imperial flatterers none has been more faithful, more devoted, or more disinterested, than M. de Persigny; and he at least would publish nothing that in his opinion was calculated to settle the Government of the Emperor, or even to offend his feelings. His pamphlet, however, has for the moment been thrown into the shade by the speech delivered at Ajaccio, Corsica, by the Prince Napoleon, cousin of the Emperor, on the unveiling of a statue of the Emperor Napoleon I. The speech was not only unsparing in its attacks on the imperial system, but was mixed up with a variety of other matters calculated in a high degree to be offensive to the present Emperor, and containing, indeed, almost direct words, a censure upon his system of government. The prompt and sharp rebuke of the Emperor, followed by the immediate resignation by the Prince of those public appointments for which he received no salary, are matters of history. At the time, the breach between the cousins appears to be complete; but it is remarked that no one has yet been nominated to the now vacant office of head of the Council of Regency, in the event of the Emperor's death during his son's minority. It was once supposed that Marshal M'Mahon would be appointed; it is now said that the Empress herself, having shown great capacity for government of late, will be appointed to the illustrious, but at present nominal, office. But in either case, it is noteworthy that in the event of the throne becoming vacant, the Government would fall into Ultramontane hands—an event which, after all, might not be so injurious as at first sight it appears. The rising Protestantism of England was threatened to be crushed, but it was really strengthened, by the reign of Philip and Mary. All these matters are handled with great force by our correspondents. From their letters, too, it seems that even French Protestantism is in its troubles. Two pastors of the ultra-Rationalist school require assistant preachers. The pastors will nominate only men of their own views, the Consistory refuse to sanction these nominations, and neither party is willing to give way.

The relations between Italy and the Papacy appear also to be in a highly interesting and critical state. We noticed, in our May number, the mission of Signor Vegezzi to the Pope, concerning which there was at that time a good deal of mystery. That mission, as for the present proved to be a failure, but at the same time a good deal of light has been thrown both upon the origin and the progress of the negotiations. It is said that King Victor Emmanuel is not satisfied with the recent course of Italian policy. A Turinese, so intensely and so narrowly attached to his native city as the humblest citizen there, he does not feel at ease in his new capital of Florence. And further, a devoted Romanist, in spite of his personal and political transgressions, his conscience is said to be troubled at his continued estrangement from the Romish See, and he has long been knocking at the Pontiff's door for the means of reconciliation. His efforts were all in vain till the publication of the late Convention, when the Pope also beginning to distrust the policy that had led the Vatican to the brink of ruin, bethought himself of Victor Emmanuel's desire for forgiveness, and resolved to endeavour to turn it to some account. The negotiations were personal on both sides; neither the King's Ministers at Florence, nor the Pope's at Rome, were consulted in the matter. This was done on the plea that the questions related to the rights of the Church rather than of the State, and concerned solely the number of dioceses in the Italian dominions.

that were destitute of bishops. On both sides, however, the Ministers and control over the negotiations thus commenced without their advice; but they appear to have been more successful than the constitutional advisers of the Pope soon shown in the arrogance of the terms demanded. In the beginning of the Pope had shown himself willing to listen to reason; but, as they went on to allow of a single bishopric being suppressed, and he would not hear of those required to be appointed in such sees as were once within the domain of taking the oath of allegiance to the King. These were terms that no constitution whatever his personal inclinations might be, could venture to accept; and when that Signor Vegezzi has returned to Florence, and that his mission is considered, But it is impossible not to see that a very slight modification of terms, one which might bring about a reconciliation between Rome and Florence, in which contrasted but ill with the rising liberty of Italian thought. This reflection gives an aspect to the efforts of Protestants in the various parts of that beautiful country, at the meeting of the Waldensian Synod, of which an interesting account is given in our correspondent's letter of this month. We cannot but share in the feeling have been generally entertained there, that the gathering of so many Protestants from this and other countries at this Vaudois assembly is a token for good, means of diffusing throughout Evangelical Europe a fresh interest in the simple-minded, earnest, and devoted people.

Our German correspondent sends us an account of the first meeting of that calls itself the Protestant Association. The gathering took place at Eisenach, of the early years of Luther; and the heads of the body were eager to claim the title which has become so famous in connexion with the name of the Reformer. But, notwithstanding this, they have little in common with him, except in freedom of thought. Discarding his creed, they claim, in the name of human intellectual freedom, to go beyond his theological doctrines. It is not merely, however, that these men should have formed themselves into a society. One of the difficulties in France and in Germany, as well as in this country, is to ascertain what it is they now hold, and how far they are prepared to make innovations in faith and practice. Each one refuses to be bound by the opinions of his predecessors, except in the way of negative, is cautious of committing himself. It may be said, that now they begin to form themselves into an association, they will put a definite form of belief—some common bond of fellowship—which others may not have. The Romish Church is troubled with these heresies too, but deals with them in a characteristic way, by suppressing their publication.

The news from America during the past month indicates a great subsidence of the excitement caused by the assassination of President Lincoln. The cry for revenge, so prominent in the early circumstances, has given way to the deep, settled conviction, that the more atrocious the crime, the more necessary it is that the calm majesty of the law be fully vindicated. It is now rising up against the exceptional tribunal before which the trial of Davis is now proceeding. Jefferson Davis still continues in Fortress Monroe, and the officers that Generals Lee and Longstreet are to be put on their trial along with him for high treason. But these officers have not yet been arrested, and the impression created by Davis which was sent over to Europe, it now appears, was drawn up without the sanction of the President, who has quashed it; and for the present there is no charge against those implicated in the crime of assassination. It is believed, however, that for treason will proceed, that the law of America on this subject will be more strictly enforced than that the prisoners will be pardoned. The external relations of the Republic are in the extreme; far from wishing to enter into war with other nations, they are engaged in disbanding their huge armies, and laying up their war ships. The President professes his wish to live in peace with all the world.

H O M E.

The progress of the High Church party Romeward has at last begun to make itself felt even of that branch of the Legislature which is supposed to be least susceptible of religious impressions. The notoriety which the confession of Constance Kent has attracted, the semi-Romish ritual, and the monastic discipline enforced by some clerical authorities, has produced one good effect—that men in authority can no longer shut their eyes to the

is true the House of Lords was not very tolerant of a lengthened debate on the subject ; but that body is all unused to the discussion of such questions, and never defers its dinner hour for any consideration short of actual necessity ; but now that the thin end of the wedge has been introduced, we may look for much more prominence being given to these questions hereafter. It is rumoured that one or two members of the Episcopal Bench are prepared, in case of the subject being renewed, to declare themselves in support of the Tractarian manumeries. There will be no reason for Protestants to be dismayed, if such should be the case. The evil of Tractarianism is, that like a poisonous marsh-vapour, it creeps along the ground and diffuses itself unperceived. It will be a new thing to have an opposition of Tractarian principles and a defence of Tractarian practices from the heads of the Church themselves ; Protestants will then know what they have to trust to. In the meantime there is enough to excite, not alarm, indeed, but some degree of apprehension, in the spread of the heresy itself. The temperate statement made by the Marquis of Westmeath showed how the heresy is spreading from district to district ; and it is not the least remarkable circumstance in connexion with it that, while the Bishop of London condemns Tractarianism in his place in the House of Lords, and only laments his inability to suppress it, he goes on consecrating Tractarian churches and appointing Tractarian clergymen in all the districts of London. We do not wish to impugn his lordship's sincerity, but if he be indeed so powerless as he says, that ought not to be forgotten when the question is next raised of the increase of bishops. If they cannot protect the Church from the inroads either of superstition or scepticism, men will be tempted to ask what they are good for at all.

The new Romish Archbishop has signalled his assumption of dignity by issuing a pastoral, in which he announces to his followers the principles on which he proposes to conduct his administration of the affairs of his Church. The ex-Protestant rejoices in the new fetters his spirit is found for itself. Amid the din of contending doctrines he is glad that another has to decide for him what he has to believe and what to obey. He dilates with great unction on the happiness of belonging to a Church that knows what it means, and means what it says. He congratulates the members of his Church that twice within this generation they have heard the voice of infallible truth—once in the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and once in the recent Encyclical. To such abjectness as this has an Englishman owed his once free spirit ! It is a significant comment on this singular document, which proceeds all through on the transparent fallacy of mistaking confident assertion for infallible truth, that almost coincident with its publication has been the recantation from Rome of two Englishmen, neither of them undistinguished ; the one the son of the late Dr. Arnold, the other the son of the late Sir Francis Palgrave ; and we are further told that the satisfaction of the old Roman Catholic party with the elevation of Dr. Manning has by no means diminished.

It is well known that the Roman Catholics have long chafed under the nature of the oath they are required to take before they enter upon Parliamentary or municipal office. That oath was originally framed by the late Sir Robert Peel, in concert with the heads of the Roman Catholic Church, and was intended to give security to the Established Church, then supposed to be weakened by the Emancipation Act. The oath binds him who takes it, among other matters, to repudiate the doctrine that heretic princes may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, to defend the settlement of property made at the time of the Revolution, and to declare that he will not use his position to injure or to subvert the Established religion. It is to dispense the necessity of taking this oath that Mr. Monsell, himself formerly a Protestant, has introduced a bill and carried it through the House of Commons. The measure was opposed by the great bulk of the Conservative party, on the plea, that it was an unnecessary removal of one of the safeguards of the Protestant Establishment. They were willing to free the oath of all that would be considered offensive to the feelings of the Romanists, such as being compelled to swear that they would be no party to the assassination of a heretic sovereign ; but Mr. Monsell would not accept the compromise. In recommending it, Mr. Disraeli made a remarkable speech—one that could only bear the interpretation of inviting the Roman Catholics to break up their alliance with the Liberal party in politics, and to join the Conservatives. The alliance with the Liberals, he reminded them, has subsisted for upwards of fifty years, and what have the Roman Catholics gained by it ? They have not injured the position of the Protestant Church, which both in England and in Ireland is more firmly established and more efficient than ever. But they had materially contributed to the injury of their own Church. Through the existence of a Liberal Government in England, which was helped to be maintained in power by their votes, it had become possible kingdom to be established at the expense of the temporal dominion of the Pope, to the injury of his spiritual authority. Surely the Roman Catholics were not satisfied with the results from the Liberal alliance as these. Would it not be much better that they break off their existing engagements, give up the attempt to subvert the Church, which they must by this time see to be hopeless, and ally themselves with the Conservative party, who, in return, would guarantee them all the privileges for which, as an unestablished body, they could reasonably require? Such was the thinly veiled under a haze of words, that was made to the Roman Catholics by the Opposition in the House of Commons.

The Princess of Wales has, since our last publication, given birth to another auspicious event arrived as unexpectedly as on the birth of her firstborn. It was not expected till about the end of last month, and there was so little of premonitory that a dinner party was invited for that day, and were actually assembled at Marlborough House while the Princess was in the pangs of labour. It is a matter of thankfulness that the birth was as safe as it was sudden, that her Royal Highness has had a healthy child, and that her infant is also healthy and thriving.

The near approach of the general election has exercised its usual influence on the progress of legislation. Ireland has for several years past been the battle-ground, and great efforts have been made by both to conciliate the Roman Catholics. We alluded above to the remarkable speech of Mr. Disraeli. This was greatly improved by Lord Derby's proceedings on the same subject, in the House of Lords. His lordship spoke twice against the Roman Catholic Oath Bill, but to no avail; rejection, and the bill was thrown out by a majority of 21. The Ministry, however, have not been idle; they lent all the weight of their support to the Oath Bill; they offer a compromise on the subject of a charter for a Catholic University; and a very ingenious attempt was made to smuggle into the House a bill for giving free access to Roman Catholic priests into the workhouse clause which was inserted into an innocent-looking bill for continuing the payments for a few years more, was detected in time; and as it was thought the matter too important to be settled in this incidental way, it was struck out. The bill in its present stringent form of clerical subscription passed through both Houses without a whisper of opposition, and has now become law.

NINETEENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE BRITISH ORIGIN

TO BE HELD IN HULL, SEPTEMBER 26—29, 1865.

THE Committee of Council have accepted a cordial invitation from their Christian friends in Hull to hold their next Conference in that town. There is a general concurrence of opinion that Hull has been well chosen for this annual gathering; and it is earnestly hoped that the members of the Alliance and others friendly to Christian union will assemble in considerable numbers on that occasion, to strengthen each other's hands and gladden each other's hearts by prayer and counsel, and the consideration of subjects of deep interest to them with the progress of the Gospel and the promotion of spiritual religion.

In the evening of Tuesday, September 26, there will be a soirée in the public hall, for the reception of members and others friendly to the cause of Christ, and for mutual introduction and social intercourse. The Mayor of Hull to preside.

At the meetings on the following days addresses on various subjects of importance will be delivered by brethren whose names will be announced in our next number. Several are also expected to be present and speak on the state and prospects of the Evangelical Alliance in this country and elsewhere.

Hospitality is offered to the Christian friends intending to be present. Communion will be administered to W. J. Lunn, Esq., M.D., or E. Wallis, Esq., Hull, who are acting as the committee in that city, or to the secretaries of the Alliance in London.

 ow a decisive weight into the balance at times when it is nicely hung, the Papacy; that the principal Romanists in Great Britain are confident of hat persons tormented with religious doubts, so common in this age, who do e infidels, end very frequently by stifling not only their doubts, but ous freedom and vitality in the embrace of Rome;—such are the main urable to Papal progress in this country which present themselves in a ew of the situation. We avowed our belief that they afford matter for 'rotestants, and that they put it beyond question that the advance made by ate in England has been real and considerable; but we stated also that various circumstances to be taken into account on the other side, and o treat more particularly of these, as well as to inquire into the question ant duty in relation to Romanism in Great Britain, in a succeeding article.
 sk we now address ourselves.

e first place, the contrast between the stationary Romanism of sixty years e progressive and aggressive Romanism of the last quarter of a century is presented more or less by all religious denominations. There has been a vival of religious fervour; the dormancy of last century has given place to nd the languor of indifference has been exchanged for the ardour of faith.
 nstance does not alter the fact of Romish progress, but it makes it, in our ss to be regretted. A corrupt and degenerate religion is a bad thing, but pathy or hypocrisy is worse. A common character about the time of the evolution was the atheist-priest. Talleyrand and Sieyès were ecclesiastics.
 irdly conceive a form of religion, if honestly held, so corrupt and corrupting l profanity taking the mask of religion. Romanism, earnest and aggressive, its boundaries and multiplying its adherents, has a startling aspect for s; but we ought to recollect that its partial victory has, in the first instance, the utter godlessness which had taken possession of the Papacy, and that , with all its drawbacks, is an improvement upon the hideous moral it of sensuality and materialism. Protestant pastors in Continental tell us that converts are generally persons who have been sincerely religious ists, seldom or never men who had cast off every form of religious belief; s is the case, it may appear that the Papacy, by stemming the torrent of n Europe, has prepared the way for a religion purer than itself. In no considerable portion of society has at any period been professedly but a vast number in last century had sunk into a state of spiritual lethargy, oned the worship of God in public, and were Christians only in name; and of question whether Romanism, acting upon this “lapsed” class, would not, ing them with some religion, put them into a better position than when no religion at all. In one word, the triumph of Romanism has, to a large en a triumph not over pure religion and undefiled—not over sincere and intelligent Protestantism—but over careless infidelity in the higher society and practical heathenism among the multitude.

It must, in the next place, be frankly conceded to those who Papacy has obtained any serious advantage in the United Kingdom, that information has been made to a reunion of this country with the Romish See. They are understood to have inspired the promoters of the "Papal aggression in moments of enthusiasm, may have floated before the imaginations of Manning, to the effect that England would at an early date return to Rome, are visionary. Protestantism in the sense of absolute freedom in religious matters—of rejection of sacerdotal tutelage and denial of superiority—of severance between civil and religious concerns, and so that priests can govern nations—is all powerful in England. This point in the position uniformly taken up by the Times in its reference to Whalley and the Protestant party distinctively so called. The all leading journal is, that Mr. Whalley summons up an imaginary danger, an imaginary foe, inasmuch as the English people are as firmly determined ever were to resist the encroachments of Rome upon their civil liberties. Mr. Whalley and Mr. Newdegate, contemplating the advance from the religious point of view, look at one thing, while the Times looks at another. Both are right, and both are wrong. Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Whalley are both affirming that Rome has gained advantages, and that she has made religious Protestantism, but wrong in displaying an amount of agitation which would be justified only by the probability that Rome will ere long possess power over England which she possessed before the Reformation, and in the elements of resistance presented by secular Protestantism; the Times is declaring that there is no disposition in the English public to place themselves under the surveillance of the Pope, or to subject religious speculation to censorship, but wrong in ignoring that stealthy advance of Romanism. The religious creed of thousands of Protestants in England is being undermined. They are not sure that it is altogether a reassuring circumstance that the Romanism which spreads in England is a Romanism adapted in certain particulars to English tastes. In Dr. Newman's most interesting narrative of his religious history and the least interesting parts are those in which he confesses his inability to resist the Italian type, and betrays an invincible repugnance both to Jesuitism and to the worship of Mary. Dr. Manning's Pastoral Letter to the clergy and laity in England is a perfect specimen of that Popery which is so much prepared for the English as unconsciously substituted by Englishmen for the Popery of Italy, Spain, and Chili. There is hardly an allusion in the Pastoral Letter to the Virgin Mary; there is a conspicuous absence of saint-worship, purgatory, and miracles; while, on the other hand, Scripture is quoted copiously, the Church is presented as guarding every jot and tittle of the Bible, and occasion is taken of salvation through the blood of Christ in terms which could not have been used by Luther or Calvin. True, the Archbishop professes and inculcates submission to the Pope; but unless he did this the letter would not be the Anglicism of the Popery which is making way in England is only a gilding of the pill: what we allege is that the pill is very skilfully gilded while the essentials of Romanism are brought in, certain of its characteristics which are specially obnoxious to Englishmen are kept in the background. This adaptation of Romanism to English tastes may be an alarming symptom, but it at least proves that Protestantism, in its great distinguishing characteristics, is still irresistibly strong in England.

ost zealous and bigoted Romanists practically acknowledge the necessity of conciliating it.

It deserves to be mentioned, though the circumstance is not of high importance, that there have been signs of late of a revulsion of feeling on the part of English converts to Romanism. One or two boasted accessions to the Romish communion have returned to their early faith. Mr. Arnold and Mr. Palgrave, men whose intellectual superiority is undoubted, were among the most brilliant of the conquests made by Rome from the rising young men of England, and they have found the promises and fascinations which attracted them false and unsubstantial. Their return to Protestantism is a sensible check to Romish proselytism, because it tends to dissipate an illusion in which both Romanists and Protestants have believed. If there was one thing of which any one looking wistfully to Rome was specially assured, it was that Rome would give him rest. There would at least be no more mental commotion, no disquietude, no doubt, no agonised wrestling with sceptical objections, no fever of perpetual change. The sleep might be deep—deep as the sleep of the blind, as the sleep of the dead—but it would, at least, be unbroken; and to the forlorn and wearied soul, tired with “ever climbing up the climbing wave,” there was relief even in the “long rest” of intellectual death. But it now appears that the infallible Church cannot guarantee repose. She has no draught potent enough—no lotus flower of charm sufficient—to ensure a dreamless slumber. There have been whisperings that not a few of those who left the Church of England to join that of Rome have found the fact different from what they imagined it, and that Mr. Arnold and Mr. Palgrave are merely the boldest and most consistent among a number of adventurers. Whatever amount of truth there may be in this, we cannot err in regarding the reversion of Mr. Palgrave and Mr. Arnold as a new and significant proof of the profound incompatibility of Romanism, except in peculiar and isolated cases, with vigorous mental capacity. The proximity in date between the return of these gentlemen to Protestantism and the publication of the Encyclical has been sought to indicate a connexion of cause and effect between the events, and there can be no doubt that, in relation to propagandism in Great Britain, nothing could have been more unfavourable to Rome than the issue of that surprising document.

But we have not yet brought forward the chief argument of those who maintain that Popery is making no progress in England. We have done no more than throw at the skirmishers to clear the way for the decisive charge. Statistics, it is said, expressly prove that Rome is making no extraordinary or alarming progress in England. Mr. Lumley, Honorary Secretary to the Statistical Society of London, having thoroughly investigated the subject, presents us with a demonstration that the progress of Popery, relatively to Protestantism, has been nothing like what most persons imagine it to have been. The total number of ministers of all denominations in England in 1851 was 25,978. In 1861 they had increased to 30,258. Of the established clergy the increase was 10·8 per cent., of Protestant ministers the increase was 22 per cent., of Roman Catholic priests the increase was 21·6 per cent. “Though the number of priests,” says Mr. Lumley, “has increased in a greater ratio than the numbers of the clergy of the Established Church, they have not increased in so great ratio as the Protestant ministers. Of course the demand for the clergy depends upon the number of churches, which is limited by that of the parishes, whereas the demand for ministers and priests depends on the congregations, which is not subject to any arbitrary limit.” Taking the number of places of worship, the increase in ten years of Nonconformist Protestant chapels was 1,163, of Roman Catholic chapels 173, of churches in connexion with the Establishment 108. “It appears”—we quote Mr. Lumley—“that for a time the number of Roman Catholic per cent., and 500,000 in 1861, when the population was round 4.4 per cent. The increase in the first period of seven years was in the second period of ten years it was only $\frac{1}{2}$." On these figures Mr. [unclear] following important remarks: "It is obvious that this is the real and peculiar circumstance, and is not produced by the action or conversion of the inhabitants of this island. The increase was for a while rapid, but then came a strong check, and the progress is slackened. It is difficult to render a complete explanation of this phenomenon, but it exhibits the return of all the marriages which are solemnised in England, it includes those of the Irish and of foreigners. Now, it is a fact that there has been a great immigration of Irish and of foreigners during the last twenty years. They marry in this country as well as the marriages are included in these tables. According to the report of the commissioners, the number of foreigners in England in 1851 was 186,179, of whom 73,434 were Europeans. The population of England in 1841 was 289,404—i.e., 1.8 per cent. upon a population of 18,400,000. In 1851 it was 519,959, or 2.9 per cent. upon a population of 18,400,000. In 1861 it was 601,634, or 3.0 per cent. upon a population of 20,000,000. The number of Catholics was 4.2 per cent. of the population, and that was in 1861. Now, the greater proportion of foreigners are French, Italian and Spanish, who are almost all Catholics, or Germans, who are almost all Catholics; while of the Irish in Ireland, it is not an unreasonable estimate to say five-sixths to be of the Roman Catholic faith. The immigration into England coincided with the increase in the Catholic marriages, and the increase has slackened, so the increase of those marriages has diminished the number of their children born in England, being counted with their parents, may somewhat embarrass their accurate discrimination in the English Catholics."

Such is the case of those who maintain that Popery has made alarming progress in England. It is, we acknowledge, a strong circumstance that it is so strong. The following is Mr. [unclear] in England, but is making real progress. That matters might be worse, is no proof that all is as it should be. If the most any one ventures to maintain is that in England, the head-quarters of the Reformation, Protestantism continues to hold her own against Popery, the fact is sufficiently serious. Be the causes what they may—secession from the Church of England or immigration of Irish and foreign Papists—the attitude of Popery is beyond question more imposing, the power of Rome is indubitably greater, in England at this moment, than has been the case since the seventeenth century. If there is a steady stream of Anglican Evangelicals into the ranks of Protestant Dissent, there is a stream which flows more intermittently, but at times with greater volume, of Tractarians and High-Churchmen into the Church of Rome. Nor are the accessions to Popery to be estimated by mere count of heads: if rank and talent stand for anything in the computation, the advantage will be largely on the side of Rome. Is it pleasant to think of these things? Is it altogether reassuring that the minority of Roman Catholics, so long dwindling in England, has, to say no more, ceased to diminish? Is it creditable to our Protestantism that it has not absorbed the Irish and foreigners who have taken up their abode in Protestant England? Our readers will answer, No, and will ask us what is to be done. Little or nothing, we reply, beyond deepening and clarifying our conceptions of Protestant truth as opposed to Romish corruption, and increasing our zeal in proclaiming an unpolluted, unimpaired, unobscured Gospel to all classes of the people. To look principally to the Legislature for aid in the conflict with Rome is the most fatal of mistakes. Essentially the struggle is one of opinion, and in battles of opinion even the semblance of force applied or invoked on one side confers an advantage on the other. It is by a courageous and thoroughgoing Protestantism that Popery can be effectually combated, and intelligent Protestantism has long since declared that, in civil and political relations, Roman Catholics stand on the same footing with other subjects of Her Majesty. Let there, then, be no grudging in this concession; if persecution and intolerance are discarded, let none of their petty annoyances, their insulting badges, be retained. We do not, however, affirm that the Legislature has nothing to do with this matter. The constitutional arrangements of Great Britain are Protestant, and so long as it is the legal right of a Protestant nation to have its Established Church Protestant, its Legislature is bound to exclude Popery from the pulpits of the clergy. The line between tolerating Romanism and endowing Romanism must fall somewhere, and when Romanists demand that chalices and crucifixes shall be bought for them out of the money of Protestants, the place where it ought to fall seems to us not undiscoverable. It is beyond question, also, a disgrace to the Legislature that neither congregations nor bishops can effectually resist that insolence of ritualism by which loyal and devoted members of the Church of England are compelled to choose between Dissent and a glaringly Romish mode of celebrating public worship. On points like these Parliament ought to be moved, and it is discreditable to our representatives that they leave them in the hands of the present well-intentioned but hopelessly and painfully incapable leaders of what is called the ultra-Protestant party. But it is not in Parliament that the strength of Protestants against Rome will be found; it is in the intelligent and enthusiastic apprehension of the great truths of Christianity, in clearly discerning that their foundation in the Word of God is more stable than in the imaginary infallibility of the Church, and in energetically preaching in church and in chapel, on the village common and in the city lane, to rich and poor, in the wards of the hospital and by the bed of the dying cottager, that everlasting Gospel which is suited to every need of man, and which, by its own vital energy and expansive force, casts away all adhesions and pollutions—in these it is that the strength of English Protestantism will be found.

or any volatile gum exude from the tree, the air loses no time in the whole of it; and at a long distance you can tell by the fragrance carries off the attar of the rose, or the blossomed essence of the rose. Indeed, it is certain that there is nothing capable of rising—becoming a gas or a vapour—which does not also exist in the air.

Society and the individual are, in the same manner, surrounded. There are maxims, opinions, conventionalities, in the midst of which we live, and have our intellectual and moral being; and to a great extent our physical and spiritual energy will depend on the purity of the medium we are daily inhaling. In our last paper we tried to analyse our mode of living, that invisible and almost impalpable ocean of thought and opinion in which we are at this instant living; and we pointed out two peculiarities. One is, that life is excessively stimulating or exciting it is. As if some nitrous oxide element were in it, life has become a top-speed, whirligig career, with all its rush and rapidity. With bounding pulse, hectic cheek, and restless trader is in haste to be rich, and would like to make his fortune in a year. Our fathers took a long time to recover from disasters, but—so buoyant and so buoyant are our spirits, that, before neighbours can well cross the grave of our friend or the wreck of our fortune a thousand miles away, even our literature shares the revolution: slow writers like Homer are discarded for sublimer or at least more surprising productions, where a Paradise is lost in every page; and where, up so many zig-zags, the reader is swept to an Olympic elevation, and in the universal summit finds the parricides and swindlers of the outset come out in all the types of heroic virtue. In curious contrast with this secular fever and severity, frequently amounting to a general scepticism, which marks the spirit of research, we have got far away from the age of asceticism, and some of us would be very glad if a few asceticisms were the general doubt and denial. It is rather mortifying to find history enormous "Monte Testaccio," where you cannot pick up one telling character. but find yourself dissolving evermore in a mighty mass glad to notice that they give forth no uncertain sound, but that all the tires and axles are tight and true; but if next he comes up to our compartment, and, by way of ascertaining whether there be glass in the window or soundness in our cranium, uplifts his hammer, we beg to be excused—not because we have any doubts of either, but because we doubt if for either this is the right criterion. And so the authenticity of the New Testament and the historic truth of its statements we are willing should be subjected to the hardest hammering of the scholar and the critic; but when questions are raised which our moral consciousness decides—Is there a God? Is it right to love your Father? Is it right always, and at all risks, to speak the truth?—we deprecate the scholastic hammer. We know that there is glass in the window; for we see through it, and it shuts out the wind: your demonstration will only break it. We know that our head is sound, for it reclaims against your obliging offer to destroy it. There is a great deal which we see, and feel, and know, and which belongs to a higher sphere than the mere reasoning faculty, and which we should be very sorry to submit to the logician's sledge-hammer. From neither cowardice nor superstition, but from the instinct of self-preservation, there are affections and emotions which we mean to exercise, whatever may be urged to the contrary; and if we love our neighbour, and love the Lord our God, we believe that we shall be doing the very thing for which we were made, and, in spite of all syllogisms and all seeming experiments, we shall still deem it a reasonable service.

"Enough, enough," cries the reader. "We have had more than enough of this. We agree that the age is fast and feverish; and we also know that it is free-thinking and rationalistic. The atmosphere, we own, is, on the one hand, exciting and overstimulating; on the other hand, we are occasionally conscious of a depressing and malarious element—a dry materialistic and unbelieving tendency. But how are we to keep ourselves from the evil in our time, and how are we to influence it for good? And, after all, is the time so bad that it is a pity to have been born so late, and not got through our probation sooner?"

Far from it. On the great interdiffusion principle, when a good air is evolved anywhere, it spreads and soon is everywhere. Nor was the vital air of the Gospel ever so widespread as it is at this moment, nor ever so telling. As a type of its influence, we may take what is now transpiring in some of the chief centres of India, where, shamed out of their hideous mythology, many of the most intelligent men are trying to set up a simpler faith and a purer morality—in fact, a Christian ethics in union with a natural theism. In the same way, there is now a prodigious amount of Protestantism within the pale of Romanism; and, with their contempt for living legends, their pity for the Pope, and their horror of the confessional, millions of continental Catholics are much farther from Rome than some Anglican priests and monks.

Then again, Christianity itself was never purer. There have been times when men showed an intenser love for particular doctrines—times, also, when particular faces were more signally developed. We may well look back with reverence to the days when, in loyalty to Christ, men left their homesteads and the sweet breath of heaven, and pined the weary years in dark and loathsome dungeons, and were only so happy when it came to the crowning act, and from the scaffold or the flaming pile, crying "None but Christ," they soared to immortality. And no one who has an intellect of his own, or respect for truth, will speak scoffingly of the Athanasians, and Augustines, and Anselms, who bent their powerful minds to deep problems in divinity, or the grave and anxious doctors who, at Nicea, or Dort, or Westminster, spent the long summer day, or the rich and returnless year, guarding, defining, and expounding some tenet in the faith. Still, in Christianity there is something more precious than any proposition ; and of all sayings that is evangelical, and of all systems that is the most successful, which leads men to the Saviour, and which most endears the Christ of God. As has been the great characteristic of Christianity, and the great moral proof of its truth, it has been the main source of the moral development of Europe ; discharged this office not so much by the inculcation of a system, however pure, as by the assimilating and attractive influence of a living faith. . . . There is nothing in the history of the human race more striking than the way in which that ideal has traversed the lapse of ages, increasing in strength and beauty with each advance of civilization, and influencing every sphere of thought and action. . . . an exaggeration to say, that at no former period was it so powerful, or so generally acknowledged, as at present. This is a phenomenon altogether unique to those who in the highest type of excellence recognise the highest Deity, its importance is too manifest to be overlooked.* If not through the rapture and devotion, in many directions we can perceive efforts after truth, and as a result of such efforts, the Saviour himself must become more personally influential, more and more paramount. And whether they be devoted to doctrine, or who discard all systems for the simple Word of God, the Cross of Christ is the one reconciliation betwixt earth and heaven. Jesus is the one rallying point for a grateful and admiring world. His own ; His character is God's likeness ; in efforts after that ideal which we impersonate, there is a problem for all the ages, and a pursuit sufficient in whom God the Holy Ghost has enkindled the love of glory and without forfeiting one attribute of a genuine humanity—without discarding any feature or natural taste—without translating ourselves into Hellenism. Most assuredly there is a way of being so translated into Christ that a man may be a Christian—business, recreation, study, pleasure, pain—all brought into subordination ; and room enough for each generation to supply a thousand different kinds, each specimen distinct, natural, independent, a free harmonious whole, all alike in as far as it is from looking unto Jesus that each has characteristic nobleness or beauty ; all children of the first resurrection in glory, but starry all, and all “ bearing the image of the Heavenly Father.”

To no small extent has Christianity improved the air of earth and been the great softener. It has thrown a balm into the atmosphere and multitudes have felt the charm, and so far yielded to its force who have been hostile to Christ. It is this humanising influence which has broken down slavery, and to the mitigated bondage of serfdom. It is this which has made factory children under its protection, and secured for them some measure of rest and play. And it is this which will by-and-by make toil less tiresome and cottage with amenities and resources presently unknown, except in the palace of a monarch. It is this which, having voted war wicked, will by-and-by make the duel of two nations as impossible as the duel of two brothers ; and, listening to better blood than that of Abel, will convert the last of the cruel strife which began outside the gates of Eden.

Christ is the Saviour of all ; Christianity is a religion meant for all. Unlike Judaism, which was an isolated mass, an insoluble crystal, salt in the land, intended to melt and permeate the entire soil of humanity hid in the meal, and designed to go through the whole lump and give it life ; or, as we have now put it, if there be a certain atmosphere union which surrounds society, Christianity, or the genius of the Gospel, or rather the Holy Spirit speaking through the Word and through the lives of holy men, is gradually introducing a new and better element. And whilst we ought to rejoice with a joy pre-eminent in every sinner saved, we should be very thankful at the larger spread of the pure and life-sustaining element.

At this even the worldly should be glad. Where there is no vapour in the atmosphere there is no softness in the distances—outlines may be clear, but they are hard and bare; as no kind veil is thrown over the baked and burning slopes, so there is the watery treasure impatient to slake their thirst and revive their barrenness. And drawn from the wells of salvation, from the broad expanse of the Gospel, there is exhaled into earth's atmosphere an element which, neither importunate nor habitually remembered, is widely diffused and invaluable. If you ask, What is it that, amid toil, and drudgery, and disappointment, bears up the nobler natures? we answer, The hope full of immortality. What is that in a hundred sick-rooms inspiring the pale sufferer meek and patient and unmurmuring, except the pattern and recollected presence of Him who, from the midst of peerless agony, exclaimed, Father, thy will be done? And what—in a thousand work-rooms and counting-houses, in many a smoky kitchen and sultry garret, in the hut that holds the Highland school, or the shed which receives the savage congregation—what is it that keeps up to the task of habitual dutifulness and high-hearted diligence the sempstress and servant, the teacher and the missionary, except his high calling, his remembrance of that Master who, taking the form of a servant, performed the whole so excellently as to nobilitate the lowliest post, and make conscientious work a Christian worship? What is it that over the arid waste of human existence, with all its meanness, its frequent follies and its fearful crimes—what is it that spreads a softening veil of hope and kindness, that it be not Christian charity—that charity which can afford to hope all things; for on its side are the promises of God, and in its hand is the message of omnipotent mercy—that Christian charity which, along with the Christian ideal, diffuses itself over a poor and pitiful present, not merely as a softening sentiment lending enchantment to the view, but which melts down in the plenteous rain or drenching dew of a practical philanthropy; making the wilderness blossom, converting the scapegrace and prodigal into a useful citizen, the blasphemous and ruffian into a fervid evangelist; just through this veiling invisible vapour, through this Bible atmosphere which we encircle and enclose Christendom, there come from time to time balmy visitations such as Heathendom never knew, and which have only come since Christ came—soft airs as from an unseen summer, a summer alongside but not seen as yet—the millennial glory yet to be revealed—fragrant airs as from some son of consolation, in whom so rich and rosy, a good man, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost—balmy airs from heaven opening when the saint goes in, and the air of Paradise, the perfume from the Tree of Life, comes forth.

CENTRAL AND EASTERN ARABIA.*

ALMOST a hundred years ago Carsten Niebuhr published his "Description of Arabia;" but although a century has elapsed since then, there are many things in the book worthy of our attention to-day. Niebuhr collected a host of most valuable facts, and has given perpetual proofs of his rare knowledge and his far-seeing sagacity. And yet the country traversed by Mr. Palgrave, and described in his admirable volumes, is to all intents and purposes a land utterly unknown to the majority of even educated Europeans. This remark may be justified by the extraordinary fact authority last named speaks of these caravans, and his brief reference of the Persian pilgrims is most strikingly confirmed and illustrated in the most remarkable chapters in Mr. Palgrave's work. Niebuhr is for believing that there is a considerable intercourse between the known parts of Arabia, and adds that it is therefore probable a traveller could visit the interior of the country. This probability realised by some, but it has been reserved for Mr. Palgrave to reduce it to fact. He has crossed the Arabian peninsula from Palestine to Kateef and the Persian Gulf. To some points in his very interesting and important volume we will invite the reader's attention.

Our author is in several respects a remarkable man. He was educated at Oxford, where his extreme opinions prevented him from continuing his studies, and he therefore entered upon a military career in India. He subsequently joined the order of the Jesuits, and it was during his connexion with them that he undertook his journey, the funds for which were furnished by the French. Since his return home he has resumed his profession of law, and has been appointed by the Prussian Government to a post which requires an intimate knowledge of the customs and language of the Arabs, and his long residence in the East, eminently qualified him for his difficult and dangerous task. "The men of the land, rather than the land of the men, were my principal research and principal study. My attention was directed to the man and his condition, and political condition of living Arabia, rather than to the physical condition of the country." And again he says: "The hope of doing something for the permanent social good of these wide regions; the desire of bringing the isolated life of Eastern life into contact with the quickening stream of European life; perhaps a natural curiosity to know the yet unknown, and the restless desire to be first, were not rare in Englishmen; these were the principal motives." "My principal object and endeavour in this work has been, according to a tolerably correct notion of the Arab race—of their condition, political, social and religious; such at least as it appeared to me." and the facts we have mentioned will show pretty clearly the sort of scribed a great curve, crossing another sandy desert until he reached Riad, the modern metropolis of Nejed. He saw the ruins of the old capital, Dereyyeeyah, and made an excursion to Kharfah, further south. After leaving Nejed, he passed still another desert, which divides Nejed from Hasa. Here he saw Hofhoof, an important city, after which he reached the shores of the Persian Gulf at Kateef, where for the present we must leave him. Our readers will be able to form some idea of the extent of country traversed if we say that a straight line drawn from Riad to Kateef would be at least 850 miles in length, and that Mr. Palgrave's route must have been from 1,300 to 1,400 miles between these two places. But the vastness of the almost unknown region commonly called Arabia will be better realised if we observe that in some places the peninsula is more than a thousand miles across, between the Red Sea and the Sea of Oman, and that the greatest distance from north to south is not less than 1,500 miles. Large portions of this enormous surface are a waste howling wilderness, almost without water, without vegetation, and without inhabitants. Scorched by a fiery sun, blasted by the burning boom, and mocked by fantastic mirage, no solitary wayfarer could live without a caravan. The pilgrims whom fanaticism urges over these fearful wilds band themselves together in large companies, and hope for safety in society; yet, in spite of precautions, they annually perish by thousands. They take the shortest path from wady to wady, from well to well, or from oasis to oasis, and yet so many of them die; while the wrecks of camel and dromedary, those ships of the desert, are strewn long the road. But, after all, whether for religious or for commercial purposes, Arabia is crossed in many places, and has been so for ages.

Over the territory we have glanced at are scattered some millions of our fellow-men. The greater portion of these live in the west and south-west of Arabia, and along the sea of Oman and Persian Gulf. Large numbers roam in tribes or clans over some particular regions, dwelling in tents like Esau of old, their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them. These are generally styled Bedouins by Europeans. Besides these, there are also dwellers in towns, who build walled cities and stone houses, and who cultivate the soil and follow mechanical arts. The least known of these are precisely those to whom Mr. Palgrave introduces us most extensively. It is true that, everywhere like himself, the Arab of Morocco or of Algeria is a twin brother to his namesake in Egypt, in the Syrian deserts, or in the great Arabian interior. The likeness is in all essential features. But we are now taught that the traveller into central Arabia will learn and see many things unsurmised by those who have only studied the Arabs who hover on the verge of civilisation and of the trading world. We are also taught now that inner Arabia contains extensive provinces, subject to native authority, with peculiarities in religion, social life, domestic habits, and much else, and that in this same heart of Arabia, surrounded by deserts, are strong towns, and districts of marvellous beauty and fertility. Here the topographer may find new names for his map, the botanist new plants for his herbarium, the zoologist undescribed varieties for his museum, the meteorologist may observe phenomena unknown to Europe, the political economist fresh phases of society, the philanthropist new forms of misery, and the Christian new aspects of perverted religion, new candidates for missionary enterprise. Here the merchantman may find a new market for wares and new wares for the market; nay, the very geologist may see that which will be a wonder to him and a problem to all. We shall explain this last allusion by and by.

It is very well known that, in the early ages of the Church, Christianity was promulgated in Arabia throughout its entire length, from Aleppo to Aden, and even Socotra and other islands in the Arabian Sea. The rise and rapid spread of

Islam in the seventh century was very fatal to the Christian profane Arabs, so many of whom adopted the old faith, that since that time been generally described as Mohammedans. These Mohammedans were divided into sects, some of which were bitterly opposed to one another; the most remarkable and powerful are the Wahhabees, a politico-religious sect named after its founder, who flourished about the middle of the eighteenth century. Accounts of these Wahhabees have appeared at different times, by J. Malcolm, by Ali Bey, and especially by Burckhardt, but the best, is that of Mr. Palgrave. This writer has also deeply interested himself in the apparently last relics of Christianity in these remote regions. At the Djowf he endeavoured to learn the traditions of the people. He says a little of their origin: "Thus far only can they affirm, that they were Christians, and that their earliest conversion to Islamism was effected by the use of all arguments, the sword, in the hands of Alee and Khatib. He subsequently mentions a famous well on the borders of the Djowf. If you ask the Arabs of the country what is its origin, "It is a well of Christians," they reply, and the same is their account of every ancient tradition throughout the whole of Northern Arabia. He adds that perhaps altogether wrong, for the principal clans in that neighbourhood were Christians for many centuries. It is, he affirms, established by monuments, and oral tradition, that Christianity was once pretty widely spread in these regions. He would not indeed be greatly surprised if there should be the same direction, although he sees little prospect of any serious change for good being brought about by European or any other than

Our author returns to the subject again when speaking of the Bedouins of that locality: "A large portion of the tribes that form the great clan of Shomer had once been Christians, and they remained so still at the epoch when they repelled the invasion of the troops. The clan of Bedr, to whom belonged the easterly range of mountains, was Christian. Probably a time came when all, more or less, professed Christianity. At last we find them relapsed into a state of semi-barbarianism, having retained old Pagan forms of worship, and subdivided themselves into as many chieftainships as there were villages in the land." It may be said: "This hitherto referred to are either vague tradition or simple history, and not the past. We shall appeal to something more tangible, but what we find that even here in the heart of Arabia, and cut off from the rest of the world, the name of Christ is not wholly forgotten. This recollection may be seen when "they that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him," said, and as we still say.

Of actual Christian profession there appears to be none, and the description of a class of persons so peculiar, that we may fairly conclude something more decisive than we have yet adduced. Perhaps it is best to let Mr. Palgrave speak for himself. This is what he says:—

From the frontiers of Syria to the innermost valleys of Nejed is scattered a peculiar character and name, everywhere the same, and everywhere distinct from the other clans, easily distinguishable, and well known to all conversant with the desert. Should any one of my readers be of this number, he will readily speak of the Salibah tribe, whose very title, immediately derived as it is from the cross, together with external and internal tradition, may seem to confirm the

this they are unrivalled. Though retaining, so far as I could discover, but very faint traces the more positive features of Christianity, they have yet one of its more negative marks in a long, unchanging hatred to Mohammedanism, which they not only neglect, in common with great mass of Bedouins, but openly and positively disavow. They are evidently strangers to Arab stem, and by their own account belong to a more northerly extraction.

The opinion or tradition last referred to is favoured by Mr. Palgrave, who adds that they stand in high repute for their knowledge of the healing art, and that it is common saying among Mohammedans, that medical science is the offspring and heritage of the Christians. He subsequently mentions this Salibah tribe in connection with their supposed Christian origin. We are disappointed with the results of inquiry, it may be, but it is interesting to perceive the slightest traces of acquaintance with our holy faith. As for the Arabs generally, they seem everywhere almost to know that there are Christians in the world, and it is common to regard them with any distinct and formal antipathy. Our traveller was obliged to cross the entire peninsula in the guise of a Christian from Damascus, and as a medical practitioner. Nor did his admitted Christianity expose him to any particular inconvenience. It is true that Christians from Damascus are not in high repute for religious zeal and spirituality; yet as Christians it is perfectly well understood that they repudiate the Koran and its prophet. The reflection is painful that there is so little vitality in the existing churches of the East in general, and that of others which were scattered all the way from Palestine to the Persian Gulf, nothing whatever remains except the almost extinct memorial. The author of "Early Christianity in Arabia" says: "Whether any Christians were left in the peninsula of Arabia at the death of Mohammed may be reasonably doubted. His dying injunction was that his native country might be inhabited solely by believers, and it was rigorously enforced in the Khalifate of Omar, who is said to have banished from Arabia the Jews who were left at Chaibar." But while Mr. Wright says this, he mentions an Arabian bishop who flourished in the eighth century, and a priest who lived at the commencement of the tenth. Besides these, we meet with another bishop in the eighth century, with Jews in our own day, and with others, who practice the ancient sun worship. Mr. Palgrave introduces us to the last mentioned, at the very outset of his book. On the first morning after leaving Ma'an, he says:—

The sun rose, and then for the first time I witnessed what afterwards became a daily spectacle, the main act of Bedouin worship in their own land. Hardly had the first clear rays struck level across the horizon, than our nomade companions, facing the rising disk, began to recite alternately, but without any previous ablution, or even dismounting from their beasts, certain formulas of adoration and invocation, nor desisted till the entire orb rode clear above the desert edge. Sun-worshippers as they were before the days of Mahomet, they still remain such; and all that the Hejaz prophet could say, or the doctors of the law repeat, touching the devil's horns between which the great day-star rises, as true Mohammedans know, or ought to know, and the consequently diabolical character of worship at such a time, and in a posture, too, which directs prayers and adorations then made exactly towards the Satanic head-gear, has been entirely thrown away on these obstinate adherents to ancient customs.

It has been thought by some that those remarkable circles of unhewn stones, of which a familiar and extraordinary example is furnished by Stonehenge, are the memorials of a worship which was rendered to the sun, or to others of the heavenly bodies. These circles are found not only in England, but in the west of France, and even in northern Africa. The cromlechs which seem to be allied to them have also been discovered as far east as the country beyond the Jordan. No history records in what age, by what race, or for what object they were erected, and they are what we have already alluded to as a wonder to the archæologist and a problem to all. We now hear of these circles of unhewn stones in the very heart of Arabia. After leaving Djebel Shomer, and Upper Kaseem, Mr. Palgrave entered Lower

I guided my camel right under it, and then, stretching up my riding stick at just manage to touch and push it, but it did not stir. Meanwhile the camel, rider, and stick, taken together, would place the stone in question full on the ground. These blocks seem, by their quality, to have been hewed from the stone-cliff, and roughly shaped, but present no further trace of art, no sacrificial import, much less anything intended for figure or ornament. They are attributed their erection to Darim, and by his own hands too, seeing that he was also for some magical ceremony, since he was a magician. Pointing towards R. affirmed that a second and similar stone circle, also of gigantic dimensions, lastly, they mentioned a third towards the south-west—that is, in the direction the confines of Hejaz. That the object of these strange constructions was religious, seems to me hardly doubtful; and if the learned conjectures the planetary symbolism in Stonehenge and Carnac have any real foundation, the monument, erected in a land where the heavenly bodies are known to have been the inhabitants, may make a like claim; in fact, there is little difference between the wonder of Kaseem and that of Somersetshire [Wiltshire], except that the one is other, though the more perfect, in England.

Relics like those described in the foregoing quotation are of an exceptional kind. Their characteristics are as well defined as those of Egyptian architecture, and they irresistibly urge us to the conclusion that, met with, they are the workmanship of one race of men, or of men allied in manners and in religion. Darim, to whom the Arabs ascribe the Stonehenge, probably lived not more than eight or nine centuries ago, and is regarded as the restorer of the planetary, or Sabean worship. But the monument is doubtless, very much more ancient, whatever their actual relation to it.

It is in perfect keeping with the character of this publication to mention things especially which throw light upon the religious opinions of Central Arabia. Let us therefore pursue our inquiries a little further in this direction. We have already mentioned the Wahhabees as a political sect prevailing in the heart of Arabia. As a fact, their presence and influence are more widely spread, and we hear of them in Persia to the shores of the Red Sea towards the west; but their cradle and the might of their power must be sought for in Nej notice of the Djowf—where, by the way, many writers, erroneously we think, look for the Dumah mentioned in Scripture. The Wahhabees displayed their zeal for the propagation of their creed and the establishment of an empire by subjugating the Djowf towards the close of the last century or the beginning of this, but the province recovered a sort of independence, as a result of the Egyptian war already referred to. The Wahhabee influence is therefore not predominant now in this district; it increases as we advance towards the east. But it is not our object to enter into many details respecting the rise, the rapid spread, and the equally rapid contraction of the limits of Wahhabee domination; yet we may remark in passing that that domination was rather one of physical force than of religious power and conviction. We may suppose, too, that the principles of the sect are permanently rooted in particular sections of the great Arab community.

The actual limit of Wahhabee preponderance towards the west is the district of Lower Kaseem, which is divided from Nejed by one of those burning sandy wastes which occupy so large a portion of the Arabian peninsula. The exclusiveness of the Wahhabees is shown in many ways. At Riad, Lieut.-Colonel Pelly found a decided objection to a European alliance, and here in Kaseem this exclusiveness appears in other forms. It is true that coffee comes from Yemen, and that articles of Egyptian and of European manufacture are brought hither; indeed, Mr. Palgrave says, "The phosphorised amadou boxes of Pollak from Vienna, after passing through the sacred cities of Arabia, are to be met with in the shops of Bereyda and Oneyzah," but an important branch of commerce once carried on with Damascus has ceased to exist. Even Wahhabee exclusiveness, however, varies in intensity, and is somewhat capricious. It would scarcely bear a European or a dervish, but it will tolerate the presence of an Asiatic Christian in many places, if not as a resident, at least as a wayfarer, provided he makes no attempt to gain proselytes, and takes care not to render his opinions any way obnoxious. That a pilgrimage through their country is not always safe and easy is abundantly proved by our author, who equally demonstrates its possibility. We almost wish he had told us more definitely in what manner he was permitted or able safely to display his own Christianity. Could he exhibit images, pictures, or crucifixes, of which, as a good Jesuit, he was surely not destitute? He does not tell us.

The peculiarities of the Wahhabees are frequently advanced in these volumes. One is their comparative disregard of numerous external matters not directed by the letter of the Koran. They have no faith in traditional rubrics and ceremonies dictated by the lovers and framers of rites and outward observances. And what they absolutely prohibit, not merely wine, but tobacco, and the wearing of gold and silk. Their monotheism is most rigid and absolute: "There is no God but God," with them implies almost the absolute negation of all other will than His, and involves not only the predestination of some to Paradise, but what Mr. Palgrave calls the "pre-damnation" of half the human race. The Wahhabees do not esteem ablution with water before prayers absolutely necessary, and will often enter a mosque without laying aside their shoes. Their proclamation of prayer is only half the common length; and they pay less regard than others to their postures in their devotions. On Fridays a sermon is preached. Rosaries are not used, and the intercession of saints is denounced as simple idolatry.

Thus we might continue, but our space is exhausted, and we must reluctantly refrain from an attempt to indicate the social and political peculiarities of the Wahhabees. Those who desire to know them must refer to Mr. Palgrave, who has accumulated a very large mass of facts and observations bearing upon the subject. It was not our intention to summarise his personal adventures, romantic though they were, by land

We spoke of Central Arabia as a field for Christian mission seems to be no hope, without a providential change in the spirit or herald of Gospel truth. To endeavour to preach Christ there present systems would be to march to certain death. The Arab idea of promulgating a religion is symbolised by the sword, and the sword is the agent by which the Wahhabees have established their empire, as their predecessors established theirs of old. Nor have we the shadow of a ray; the same deadly weapon would be used at once upon any who should propagate Christianity in those regions. The good time for that doubtless come, but, meanwhile, the duty of the Church seems to be to pray until the door is opened by an Almighty hand.

FRANCE.

THE "SAINTED MARIE ALACOQUE."

M. Pastor Rognon, writing in the French Protestant journal L'Espérance, makes the following remarks upon several subjects of current interest which are engaging attention in the Roman Catholic and Reformed Churches. Referring to the wish expressed in a highly influential periodical, that "Roman Catholicism should renounce the traditions of the dark ages, and expel from its bosom whatever is adverse to the Gospel," he goes on to say, that nothing is more calculated to show how much Catholicism stands in need of such a purgation, than the account of the fêtes of Paray-le-Monial, given by the Monde in its number for July 1. These fêtes took place such a ceremony should be of the priestly journal. ing the bones of the piety; that almost gross the Sacred Heart of Jesus those of the Rev. Father to prove that "the world Heart is the primal cause of tian and of human life;" Mermillod, Bishop of Hel Geneva," proving to his hilation" with which the Marie was honoured occurred right time "to resist the off the threatening blow century;"—such are the ose journalists who are taking advantage of all the errors and all the misfortunes of the various Christian churches to direct their blows against Christianity itself!

THE NEW SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

While Catholicism does not even attempt a needful reaction against the two enemies by which it is being secretly undermined—superstition and theocracy—Protestantism in France is engaged in an energetic struggle against a subversive principle, which it must repel at any cost, if it wishes still to live and grow. That principle is the exclusive and absolute authority of the individual conscience—in other words, the denial, expressly implied, of the supernatural, historical revelation, presented to us in its highest form by Jesus Christ. That denial is, in the present day, asserted or understood in a great number of the productions of the new school; it troubles and tears the Reformed Church of France. It sometimes masks itself under the noble aspirations of liberty and truth, which have a legitimate attraction for every one worthy of the name of man. But it is the parent of bondage only, and we repeat to the believers in this system what Rousseau affirmed of materialists and deists: "They say that the truth is never unious to mankind, and this is, in my opinion, a great proof that what they teach is not the truth."

RATIONALISM OF THE "LIEN."

It is in vain that the Lien essays to present the theory of which it is the ardent champion under favourable colours. The apologies which it every week attempts do but serve to play the spirit of Radicalism [or ultrarationalism] with which it is animated. Thus, in its last number it replies to the accusation of denying the divinity of Jesus Christ by an article which is the best proof that we could offer of our assertions on that point. Never was a case more completely open up to its adversaries. Another article, titled "Christianity and Science," and of which the remarkable and profound study of our friend M. Bonifas upon "Schleiermacher's Doctrine of Redemption" is the pretext, or as some might say, the pretext, contains a clear and frank profession of the liberal principle which we have already stated. The respected writer, who, moreover, displays as a controversialist a creditable and graceful courtesy, thus defines his tendency, which he confounds with Christianity and Protestantism: "Christianity is not a collection of facts, a set of dogmas, determined by supreme authority. It is not a foreign element, which the human soul aspires to disengage itself from, in order to build afresh upon its own soil, and with materials at its own disposal. Christianity is a movement of the human soul, an evolution of the human conscience; it is the expansion, the development, under the influence of the eternal spirit, of the needs, the aspirations, the intuitions, which are not imported into human nature, but which are native to it, and which cannot be snatched from it or neglected, without impoverishing or maiming it."

Set aside the style, pay no attention to that "influence of the eternal spirit," which may signify whatever you please, and is not this saying in plain language, Christianity is but a product of the human reason and conscience, there is no supernatural revelation, no inspiration other than that of great poets and men of genius, who have had something divine in them? Consequently, as the writer himself concludes, "for the theologian, as for the philosopher, there is but one authority, that of conscience; . . . the books of the classic and primitive era of Christianity [doubtless the New Testament] are so many awakeners or schoolmasters, who arouse and guide our religious conscience; but it is the latter alone which decides in the last resort, and which gives birth to energetic and living convictions."

Now that which the Lien professes in these lines is just that which we contend against with the whole strength of our conscience, and of our love for the Church and the salvation of souls! We say that there is an end of religion, of the ministry, and of Christian society, with such principles. Religion loses its authority, and becomes nothing more than man instructing his fellow-man; the ministry is but the uncertain and contradictory teaching of probable opinions; Christian society is a confused medley to-day of doctrines, to-morrow of contradictory ethics. The Protestant Church would be saved, as we believe, by being saved from a revolution which sets up philosophy upon the altar, and which destroys the hopes and the certainties of the faith, at the same time it sweeps away its humbling and self-denying features.

THEORIES OF A GERMAN THEOLOGIAN.

Do you wish to convince yourself of the tendency of these doctrines? Read in the Deux Patries (June 23) the picture drawn by a more than impartial hand of the tendencies and explain. Christianity itself he will seek to understand and to explain entirely as a great historical fact, without having recourse to extraordinary causes. He will hold that the person of Christ appeared upon the scene of this world without any special Divine agency." The Saviour of mankind, "like other men of genius, is the natural and historical development of humanity; the wonderful works attributed to him, his supernatural birth, his outward miracles, his physical resurrection, belong to the domain of pious legend."

Such are the theories of Dr. Schwarz, who recommended them in the warmest terms to the general meeting of the German Protestant Union (or Society), on the 7th and 8th of June, 1865, declaring, at the same time, that Christianity is not to be confined either to fundamental facts or fundamental doctrines,

SWITZERLAND.

THE RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES AND MISSIONARY JUBILEE

Basle, July 4, 1865.

The special missionary festival does not commence till to-morrow, and yet since Saturday Basle has begun to wear that aspect of religious festivity with which few towns are so well acquainted as this. Already the guests are arriving in large numbers, and, as if to give them a fraternal welcome to the city of Oecolampadius, the bells of St. Elizabeth began their first concert at seven o'clock, and all the churches of the city soon responded to them. This was an event to

We had, yesterday morning of M. Pastor Sarasin, a faithful friend of missions. He furnished the foreign deputations with the opportunity to address the assembly, whether by way of encouragement or even censure, if this was necessary. I regret that the character of all that was spoken relating any part of it. I allowed, however, to render testimony to the course adopted what may serve as warnings, and to set to work sincerely to profit by them; to show strangers their blots, errors, and weak points;—here lie the true marks of a work which belongs to God. I doubt if any of the sittings of to-morrow or the next day will make the same impression upon me as that of yesterday, for I then understood better than ever our Saviour's words, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

We met, a numerous assembly, at three o'clock, in St. Leonard's Church, to celebrate the anniversary of the Society for Scattered Protestants. The report was read by Professor Haggenbach, and related to the efforts made for securing the means of grace to poor Protestants in the cantons of Friburg, Neuchâtel, and Vaud, especially those speaking the German tongue. The meeting was afterwards addressed by M. Meyer, of Lyons, and M. Güder, of Berne.

A third meeting awaited us the same evening, in the oratory of the cathedral. It was a fraternal gathering, at which the Bible Society invited the foreign deputations to speak. They give a name to it, "The Greeting" (die Begrüssung). I was very much struck to see the part which people of the humbler class took in this meeting. Peasants, male and female, flocked to it, in the national costumes of the Grand Duchy of Baden, Wurtemberg, the rural districts of Basle, and of the neighbouring cantons. The hall was completely filled, and attention and sympathy might be read upon every countenance. One is happy to speak of these brave folks, who are never oppressed by the heat, and who never find the speeches too long. The committee, however, took care to vary the addresses; and an opportunity was afforded of hearing some of the best-known men in Protestant Germany—such as Prelate Kapp, of Stuttgart; and Pastors Knak, of Berlin; Gundert, of Calw; and Blumhardt, of Boll (Wurtemberg). Sweden was represented by M. Rudin, Principal of the Missionary Institute, and by M. Roehrich, jun.; and France by M. Meyer, German pastor at Lyons. As for Switzerland, voices were heard in the conference, by turns from Schaffhausen, Berne, Geneva, and Neuchâtel. It was near half-past eight when the company separated—the proceedings of the day thus lasting in all nine hours. This was pretty well for a beginning.

I must not omit to mention a meeting held in the morning at St. Leonard's Church. It was that of the Society of the Friends of Israel. The report, presented by Pastor

Bernouilli, gave a number of details, hitherto but little known, respecting the journey which the Messrs. Petavel made last autumn to Turin, Parma, Rome, Naples, and Leghorn, with the special object of visiting the Jews of those cities. Among many of them they experienced an altogether unexpected welcome, not only for their persons, but for the truths which they set forth. Pastors Kreia, of Strasburg, and Knak, afterwards made the warmest appeals to the meeting in behalf of the people of Israel.

Wednesday, the 5th inst., was, as I mentioned in my previous letter, appointed for the opening of the special missionary festival. At six in the morning all the ministers in the town met in a new building at Nadelberg. They were served with a frugal breakfast, and then, under the presidency of Pastor Miville, of Basle, they took part in a discussion, lasting more than two hours, respecting the religious, or rather the scriptural, instruction of the young.

At nine o'clock two large audiences were formed. The one, composed almost exclusively of women, assembled in the Church of St. Martin, to hear the annual report of the "Ladies' Association in Aid of Missions." The other, divided into three compact groups, assisted in the Missionary Institute, in the annual examination of the students. These are now eighty-seven in number, and almost entirely fill the establishment. The examinations which they thus undergo every year, before the public, are not so much a test of their abilities as a sort of review of work which has been accomplished. It is considered desirable that the friends of the Institute, those who support it by their contributions and their prayers, should have, at least once a-year, an opportunity of verifying for themselves the manner in which their studies are conducted. For this purpose, the students are divided into three sections, each of which is questioned for an hour by one of the professors of the establishment; at the end of the first hour the order of the sections changes, and also their respective subjects of examination. These exercises are opened and closed by singing; they are conducted in the most spacious rooms in the building; everybody has the right to be present at them; and they generally last from 9 o'clock till 12. We were at first disposed to pity the students, obliged to reply in the presence of an enormous crowd, and in a stifling atmosphere, to very numerous, very varied, and sometimes very embarrassing questions. But our rising compassion had soon to change into a pleasing emotion. There was no assumption of paternal or scholastic authority on the part of the professors. They invariably gave the students the designation of brethren, and the familiar thou was employed, instead of the academic you. "Brother," said worthy "Inspector" or Principal Josenhans to a young man, who was to receive ordination on the following day, "brother, what is the first special duty of a missionary, who, as will be the case with thyself shortly, arrives in an unknown land, where no station yet exists?" "To take his bearings," replied the student thus interrogated, in naval phrase, and in modest tone of voice. Then, replying in detail to the questions of his master, he set himself to explain what he understood by words in which he had answered, and showed us the newly-arrived missionary traversing (in the strictest sense of the term) the country, in search of the most suitable place for a station, establishing himself there immediately, building his hut, seeking out the natives, in order to learn the language, translating the Scriptures, and preaching to them, from village to village. The examinations this year, if we recollect aright, bore upon history, geography, Hebrew, exegesis, symbolism, and the science of missions—Missionswissenschaft—by which our brethren understand all that relates to the duties and needs of missionary life among the heathen.

At three o'clock a crowd pressed into St. Leonard's Church, as they had done on the preceding days of the week. Not a seat was unoccupied. The passages were filled; the audience extended to the doors, and even to the street. Everybody was anxious to hear the inspector's report, the jubilee report, the "silver wedding" report! The reading of this document lasted about two hours and a-half. After the first hour we were strongly tempted to say to ourselves—too long, much too long. But as we looked upon the crowd, far from showing impatience, remaining bravely to the end, and plainly resolved not to lose a word of what was said, we ended by thinking that we must be wrong, and that we ought to learn from our German friends quietness and patience. We may, moreover, explain this endurance without much trouble. Everything which M. Josenhans spoke was in some sort for those brethren and sisters, whose knowledge extended to the events of long past years, of which they were never tired of hearing. Sixteen stations of the society are now flourishing in India; they or their fathers have seen them all established after another. They sympathised with schools in Calicut, the progress of which narrated. They witnessed the departure of nearly all those twenty-nine missionaries are labouring at the present time in W. Africa. Some of them were the so-called brothers of those poor women, who, moistened eye, followed with intense interest the words of the report. And those hundred-looking villagers! These are they who united to subscribe from their scanty resources and have made heavy sacrifice in order that the deficit of their dear Society may be honourably met. Do suppose they think the speaker tedious? he tells that all the debts are at length paid. Some one told us that, in the presence of the audience, he felt deeply humiliated. That is exactly the impression we have experienced. If we took a more real personal interest in the missions, it is not probable that we should so soon wearied by the statements which they furnish us. There is, however, one thing which is a little to be regretted—that the opportunity was not afforded for these large assemblies being addressed by a greater number of speakers. It is true that this deficit is amply compensated for in the "General Conference," which opens on the last day of the festival, and in which we have seen the speakers succeed each other. But this is open to everybody, and, besides, it relates to missionary operations. Now our remarks apply to the other societies also.

Be that as it may, and admitting that the Basle brethren must know better than do the public whose requirements they to consult, the interest which arises from the variety found full satisfaction in the conference which we have just mentioned was opened on Thursday, the 6th inst., A.M., in the St. Martin's Church. A brief and animated introductory speech by the chairman (M. Christ-Sarasin), the first principal of the institute addressed the assembly in that language at once elevated and popular, which has made Dr. Hoffmann one of the most distinguished preachers of Basle. His words evidently came from a heart with mingled emotions—happy at finding himself among brethren with whom he passed eleven years of struggles, disquietude and hope; sad at the thought of the influence which death had made in that circle; but of confidence in the blessings which God in store for the Basle missions. With reference to a special fund contributed in jubilee year, Dr. Hoffmann humorously erved that henceforth every new year will be the jubilee year of one of the preceding, and that, consequently, the friends of the society might always to furnish it with sufficient funds to avoid deficits. We know not what the committee may have thought of this opinion, but they certainly could not deny the right of uttering it to him who supported it by a contribution of 3,000 thalers (about $500), obtained by him from the various Protestant princes of Germany. But it is impossible to enumerate all the speeches which were delivered during this four hours' sitting. The most striking, perhaps, were those of missionaries who had just returned from their stations, such as those of Messrs. Winness, from China; Schrenk, from Africa; and Mericke, from India; introduced, in some sort, by one of the veterans of the mission, the famous Hebich. Attention was also justly excited by an animated extempore speech from Pastor Miville, who, in the name of all his colleagues, testified to the Basle committee the signal benefits which the Church has derived from missionary effort.

July 8.

After all the enjoyment which the first portion of the festival brought with it, there was yet a larger measure in store for us in the last hours of July 6. The crowd awaiting the next engagements was continually swelling in numbers. The largest of the churches in Basle, the magnificent cathedral, was opened to them, and, though the proceedings were not to commence till three o'clock, as early as two it was very difficult to find a place. Even the upper galleries, which are more of an ornament to the edifice than for actual use by the public, and in which there never are seats, were not long in being occupied. It is probable that many of the persons who took up their post here were simply spectators, and could hear nothing; but no matter; they wished to see at least the ordination of their missionaries, and in order to do so they did not find it too long to remain five hours standing.

After a masterly performance upon the organ of Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus," which excited the deputies as they entered, Dr. Pfimann, the same whom we had the pleasure of listening to in the morning, ascended the pulpit. The address was again full of reflections of the past. How could it be otherwise, when a former inspector of missions, after fifteen years' absence, resumed, in some sort, for a day, his old functions, by assisting at a missionary ordination? He was succeeded by M. Blumhardt, of Boll, who addressed himself less to the history of the past than to the needs of the present time. His remarks also partook of the character of an exhortation.

After these venerated voices had been heard, younger ones, but not less anticipated or wished for, were listened to. There were six students to be ordained. Two of these related from the pulpit their personal religious experience, and the circumstances under which they had been led by God to follow the missionary vocation. It was a touching spectacle, which called forth the mingled prayers and tears of the 3,000 or 4,000 auditors.

The Principal of the Mission-house concluded the service. To him it belonged to give the valedictory exhortation and blessing to his pupils. The "Daily Bread" of the Moravian Brethren had as the text for the day, "If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully." "Such," said M. Josenhans, "are the last words I wish to leave in your memories. They are usually thought of only as a warning; and doubtless they involve a warning of the most serious kind. But they also proclaim a privilege—if you strive lawfully you will be crowned." Then, descending from the pulpit, the worthy Principal took his place at the altar; the six candidates knelt before him, and the entire assembly assumed the same posture. An imposing spectacle, certainly—those four thousand Christians on their knees and motionless, beneath that cathedral roof, while the Principal, putting his hands on the head of each of the young brethren by turn, devoted them to the service of the Church in remote lands. As we rose from our knees, a delightful hymn was heard from a distant gallery; it seemed to come upon us like a voice from heaven. It was the other missionary students, who sang in chorus—

Throughout the night, by heavenly light,
The one Good Shepherd guides my steps, &c.

Four hundred and fifty years before, to a day, John Huss ascended the scaffold at Constance. What a fine anniversary of that mournful, or rather victorious day! What a proof of God's faithfulness in preserving His Church, age after age, in spite of the machinations of its enemies!

We must add, to be accurate, that although the word ordained is used above, the service in question is, in fact, not equivalent to admission to orders. It is, properly speaking, a devotional exercise, in which the young missionaries receive, not ordination, but a benediction. As the Basle Institute is not a church, and does not act as a church, it does not confer upon them any ecclesiastical character. Evangelists and schoolmasters are often among those who have the benefit of these services. Such as are called to act as ministers of the Gospel, therefore, must obtain that title in their respective countries, and according to the forms which are there adopted.

The missionary festival was followed by an excursion to Beuggen, where there is a normal school and educational institution for poor children. They are situated in the Grand Duchy of Baden. The annual meeting, held in the beautiful grounds of a fine old castle on the banks of the Rhine, is always held immediately after the missionary festival; and on this, as on other occasions of the kind, was the source of much enjoyment, to which the engagements, the company, and the rural spot in which they assembled, with its trees, fruits, and flowers, alike contributed.

Two essential elements in the Basle festivals deserve mention—the hymns and the gardens. The very soul of these festivals are the hymns. Omit these, and you would have long speeches, the whole proceedings would become monotonous, and the fact is, you would become the victim of intolerable fatigue. But these hymns revive you. These powerful harmonies, in which more than 2,000 voices unite, produce upon the mind an effect which there is no resisting. The strength returns, weariness is forgotten; you cease to remember that you have been listening for a couple of hours. Our Basle friends know this so well, that they will necessarily interrupt the reading of a psalm by the singing of a few verses of a hymn fewer than four times. Then, when emotion overflows in every heart, and it can no longer be expressed in speech, how needful it is to give it wing in a song of praise or thanksgiving! In such moments we understand what Vinet said, "Adoration is a condition of the soul which music alone can express." As to the gardens, we owe them to the hospitality of two families who felt a pleasure in opening their properties upon two evenings to those who were attending the festival. The practice is traditional. Enter wherever there are no cards or invitations. The company group themselves here and there, and some one who happens to become the speaker they walk up and down, they sing, and at half-past eight they return to their lodgings. On the last evening, the farewell meeting takes place in the garden of the Missionary house. In conclusion, we would add to this account has not been written to please men, but to show what God can do by the instrumentality. We end with the motto of the Basle committee: "Not unto us O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory."

THE RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES AT GENEVA.

The annual meetings of the Geneva societies were held this year a week earlier than usual. They were immediately preceded, on Sunday, June 18, by the delivery of addresses on missions at Vandœuvres and Hauts-Crêts, in the rural part of this canton. These preliminary services produced a happy and encouraging impression.

On Monday, June 19, the annual meeting of the Missionary Society took place at the Auditoire. After singing and prayer, M. Barde, the chairman, gave an introductory address. He announced that the debt which had burdened the Basle committee was removed. It was reported, that without counting 44 agents in the service of foreign societies, that of Basle has under its direction 137 missionaries, while 102 pastors occupy fixed posts, especially among the scattered Germans in America. The total receipts of the Geneva committee amounted to 37,613 francs, including 8,000 francs arising from the weekly sou for missions. Although an auxiliary of the Basle Society, the Geneva committee is interested in others, and raised 5,402 francs for that of Paris. M. Nodding dwelt upon the impending celebration of jubilee by the Basle Society, which in 12 years has sent out 430 missionaries from its institute. Its first year's income was 20,000 francs, and now it receives from 700,000 to 800,000f, and it is out of debt. In 1811 it had not one station, but now it has two and six, constituting thirty-three churches. Casalis, Principal of the Paris Missionary Society, showed that the friends of missions promoted the work of God at home, and dwelt upon various other advantages resulting from the good work. The Basle mission progresses; 104 members have been received this year, and 160 persons are candidates for admission, while 11 native catechists are employed. In Tahiti, also, things are encouraging; the churches are reorganised, the schools are reopened, and a society has been formed there to aid public instruction.

Michel (Moravian) spoke of the great work of his church, which has 323 missionaries and 83 stations. Among the fields to which he alluded as presenting a cheering aspect were Ceylon and New Holland.

On Tuesday, June 20, the Bible Society held its fiftieth anniversary in the Auditoire, under the presidency of M. Gautier, who gave a rapid sketch of the society's progress.

It has always been happily associated with the British and Foreign Bible Society. Its resources are limited, and it reports a deficit of from 5,000 to 6,000 francs, but it has put into circulation a considerable number of the Scriptures, and has aided in the printing of Bibles for the blind. M. Goudet narrated some interesting facts on the subject of colportage, and M. de Meuron spoke of the work of the auxiliary society of Lausanne on behalf of the blind. M. Casalis testified to the value of the Bible Society's labours in mission fields. M. Convers thanked the society for its share in promoting the publication of a translation of the New Testament to the people of Malabar.

On Wednesday, June 21, the Society for promoting the Observance of the Lord's-day met at the Casino. M. Barde presided, and in his address, M. Roehrich presented the report. Meetings have been held, a circular has been issued, and special efforts have been made for securing the closing of shops on Sunday. The society has also sought to increase the number of similar associations, and promote its admirable objects in France.

Rosseeuw-Saint-Hilaire descanted upon the impediments encountered by a work of this kind in France, and especially in Paris, and he spoke hopefully, and said the idea was pressing. He urged the necessity of personal example. M. Germon, of Lausanne, alluded to the duties of employers in relation to their servants in this matter. M. Michaud, of Neuchâtel, insisted on the necessity for individual observance of the Lord's-day. M. Munier said he belonged to a society of this kind thirty-five years ago, but it declined when the divine institution of the day began to be neglected. M. Jaumes thought that a beginning must be made with the children, and recommended the subject to the attention of parents. Mr. Milsom also made some remarks of a practical tendency.

On the same day the conference of the Society for Scattered Protestants was held. M. Munier presided, and after some appropriate remarks, was followed by Mr. Milsom, a representative of the Lyons branch, which mainly occupies itself with the Hautes Alpes, where the sainted Felix Neff laboured. This gentleman showed the value and importance of the work. M. Dardier did the same by an appeal to the actual circumstances of the Protestants in south-eastern France. After an earnest address from M. Lagier, Pastor Coulin made some deeply-interesting statements respecting Italy. He said that from 50,000 to 60,000 copies of God's Word had been circulated in Naples, and that 500 children had been placed under instruction. At Rome it is a state of spiritual bondage for the citizens, but the English and Germans have their own regular services. The French, however, have no systematic provision for Protestant worship in that city, although some French Protestants are settled there, and many of the French soldiers are favourably disposed. Professor Rosseeuw-Saint-Hilaire, Pastor Klein, and Pastor Benignus addressed the meeting afterwards, adding to the information supplied by previous speakers, and to the arguments for this most necessary enterprise. In conclusion, the chairman mentioned applications which had been received for aid, and reported the founding of a new place of worship for the scattered Protestants of Friburg.

On the same day the Evangelical Society held its annual meeting, which was presided over by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné. He called attention to the breaches which had been made by death: M. Lullin died last autumn; Professor Pilet in April; Colonel Tronchin in May; and M. Perrot de Pourtalès in June. To all these he paid a worthy tribute, and closed with words of edification and encouragement. The report of the Theological Seminary was presented by Professor Binder, and the financial account by M. A. Naville. Among the speakers, were Messrs. Le Savoureux, of Royan, Cordès, of Lyons, and Germond, of the Canton de Vaud. As might be expected, the topics animadverted upon by the President had a very solemnising effect upon the meeting, and sorrow was mingled with joy and hope.

On Thursday, June 22, the Evangelical Society reassembled to consider its external departments of labour. M. A. Naville read the report, which did not disguise the difficulties encountered by evangelists and colporteurs among the French people. Schools are in some places ill attended, primary instruction is below its proper level, and Romish opposition often very powerful. But in other places meetings are frequent and protracted, the Scriptures are circulated, and good is done. A "Colporteur's Manual," moreover,

The afternoon meeting was set apart for addresses from deputations from other societies and churches. M. de Watteville, of Berne, excited much interest by his account of labours by the Evangelical Society of Berne, a home mission which has to contend with anti-Biblical influences, but supports a normal school, and maintains no fewer than 50 stations. M. Rosseeuw-Saint-Hilaire, of Paris, dwelt with much feeling and earnestness upon the hindrances to the Gospel among the upper classes, and the progress it made among the lower. M. Anet, of Brussels, recounted the obstacles to the Gospel in Belgium, owing to political and priestly influences. M. Burnier sought to animate the friends of the work, and to cheer them on with promises and assurances of success. M. Charpiot and M. Le Savoureux, moreover, specially alluded to their respective fields of labour for Christ.

On Friday, June 23, the Evangelical Alliance met. A considerable number of friends assembled, and M. Barde presided. In his address the Chairman gave a summary account of the movements of the Alliance both in the way of extension and of effort in favour of the oppressed. The speakers who followed were M. Le Savoureux, M. Benignus, M. A. Naville, and MM. S. Bost, Cordès, and Dardier, all of whom had something encouraging, instructive, or otherwise profitable to say.

hitherto confined themselves to strenuous local efforts, are forming into a political organization; in which case the Liberals are sure to rally round the young Florentine Association for the Consolidation and Extension of Constitutional Liberty. As a preliminary tactic, each party is throwing on the other the responsibility of the failure of the Vegezzi mission to Rome, so as to stand well with the public abroad and at home, while Signor Vegezzi himself is charged with all the blame of the "fiasco" by high ecclesiastical authorities. Mutual recrimination is the order of the day. The Italian Government issues a circular showing that the Pope, who opened the door, really slammed it in the face of their envoy, when he bore the tidings to the Eternal City of a fair and honourable compromise. The Pope again formally announces to the world that he remained faithful all through, while the King changed his tune and increased his demands to an unreasonable extent. The Ministry accuses the Roman Court of allowing Austrian influence to intervene, during the ongoing of the "trattative;" while the Antonelli party return the compliment, and assert that the loud, disturbing voice of the Italian democracy was listened to by the advisers of the King. An appeal to the country will, some day or other, have to settle the question. The longer the delay in making it, the stronger the forces against an accommodation with the Pope-King. In very fear lest the recent attempt at such a catastrophe has been, not abandoned, but merely remitted to a more favourable opportunity, the mass meetings of citizens continue; pamphlets for the enlightenment of the people issue in quantity from the press, and Don Ambrogio thunders away against the project in the valley of Susa and throughout Piedmont.

POPULAR PAMPHLETS.

With a reference to only three of these popular treatises shall I trouble your readers. The first is by the Duke Persigny, and is evidently the expression of Imperial and French anxiety to have done with two troublesome combatants, both of whom have been alternately, and even simultaneously, patted on the head by the politician of the Tuileries. The Duke has spent some weeks in Rome, and writes what he saw and felt of the condition of things there to the President of the French Senate in a letter captivating as regards style, ingenious in the propounding of startling theories, and plain-spoken in the exposition of patent and deplorable facts in the misgovernment of the Pope.

As the letter has had the widest circulation, the suggestions it contains are fathered on a greater than Persigny. By a clever manoeuvre, the Pope is lauded for every good quality, divine and human, but is represented as surrounded by a perverse and all-powerful clique, opposed to liberty in every shape and form, and peculiarly hostile to France, which is the alone mainstay of the Papacy, now that Spain is about to recognise the young kingdom of Italy; and even Austria is not unfavourable, on certain easy conditions, to renew civilities with King Victor Emmanuel. After delineating the ignorance and malice of this immoveable faction, he shows the gulf of perdition into which it is hurling the Papacy. He warns them that all the various advantageous opportunities it has let slip of late years are as nothing in importance to this last chance of reconciliation with Italy, before France, secure of peace and prosperity within her own borders, proceeds to execute the famous convention of last autumn. And he pictures a glorious future, if the Pope will but accept of Rome, leave all else to Italy, and embrace and bless the King of the whole land; whereas, if this plan is rejected, France will stand by unconcerned, and leave the Pope and his myrmidons and their antiquated system to their hard fate. An immediate answer has appeared to this insinuating French pamphlet from the pen of the Advocate Gennarelli, which, accepting gratefully the premises of Persigny, demolishes his conclusion with a power of logic and an accumulation of illustrative facts which have for long given the writer a high place in contemporary Italian literature. He is as conversant with ecclesiastical law as De Sanctis is with ecclesiastical theology, so that his "Rome of the Italians and Rome of the Catholics" is a companion treatise to the "Papal Rome" of De Sanctis, of which I wrote last month. He shows, from the "Encyclical and Syllabus" of 1864, that with Papal Rome there is no possibility of an arrangement; that the Pope personally is the most active maintainer of mediævalism; that the city of Rome is not the capital of the Latin race generally, but of Italy alone; and that the Romans and their brethren throughout Italy will never consent to abdicate their rights upon the Eternal City in favour of the usurper Pope. He closes, however, by showing that, while Rome "of the Capitol" must belong to Italy, there is on the left bank of the Tiber the napoleon. My own firm conviction is, that the proud Papacy will never brook such an insulting limitation of its temporal sway; and that, even though the scheme were tried, the relations of the happy family in Rome would be such—with a crowned head on each bank, representing Governments diametrically opposed in their interests and aims—that the members of it would soon seek to live at a more respectable distance from one another. This the Pope knows too well, and he will therefore stickle to the last for all or nothing, and perish in his obstinacy. On reading two such able writings, we are struck with the tenderness of the affection displayed (I fear only too artificial) towards the Papacy, as if it were Christianity; while the writers are using language and exposing facts which would disgrace the pagan worship of the sun or of the devil. Duke Persigny says: "This secret organization would unhesitatingly risk the security of twenty popes in opposing what it calls the 'revolution' of modern times." Again: "This conspiracy in the bosom of the Papacy will not give place till it destroys itself in conflict with the reality of things, like the avalanche which never stops till it reaches the bottom of the abyss." "This party is an eternal defiance of human reason." "It has not the most common knowledge of human affairs, the most simple understanding of public business." "The exercise of political sovereignty by a priest is very difficult, if not impossible, now-a-days." "The situation of Rome is such, that if to-morrow

and sold in large quantities by secular publishers; while clerical efforts of every kind are, on the other hand, put forth to counteract its influence on the public mind. The more Gospel truth is known, the more will the incompatibility of an alliance with Papal Rome by a free people be felt and acknowledged, and the more useless will appear the attempts of the new Catholic party—the moral priests' movement—represented by the Esaminatore, and bearing the names of Savonarola, Arnold di Brescia, Paolo Arpi, Scipione de' Ricci, Rosmini, Gioberti, Cagli, and Perfetti on its banners—to reform the Church of Rome by abolishing the celibacy of the priests, rendering confession optional, reforming the services in the vulgar tongue, and freeing the Book of God of the Papal ban against its circulation.

HOSTILITY TO PRIESTCRAFT.

As it is, light on these questions is thickening. The priests had little to do with the great Dante Festival, which made Florence so brilliant a few weeks ago. Nor were they even invited—and they took umbrage at this, and a paper war has arisen—to the holiday rejoicings in honour of the great poet at Ravenna, where his bones have recently been discovered. These were great civic festivals, and stood clear of church machinery and influences, formerly thought an absolute necessity, in order to gild with prestige any cause in the eyes of the people. Milan adheres to its protest of last year, and sends no musical bands nor soldiery to the Corpus Domini procession, and other large towns have this year followed its example. All this, because at the national festa in June the only dark objects in the general illumination of the townships of Italy are the cathedrals and buildings occupied by priests. Only the other day, the people of Cagli, in the Marche, tore down the Pontifical escutcheon from the Archbishop's door, on the ground that the Italian arms are never allowed to be displayed in the Papal States, nor is a vessel with the Italian flag allowed to enter the harbour of Civita Vecchia. The statistics of State support to the priesthood are being looked into; for the discovery that no less a sum than 43,000*l.* sterling was spent in 1864, according to the War-office balance, for expenses of worship in the various regiments of the Italian army, has caused great talk of late. Indeed, priestcraft is reduced to a low ebb, when it is known that, despite whipping and spurring, there has only been collected, and that throughout all lands, for the purposes of the propagation of the Papal faith, one-sixth of the sum which England alone contributed in 1864, through her great societies, for the spread of the Gospel.

EVANGELIZATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

The freshest evangelization news is from the north-western extremity of Italy. I happen to know that for two or three years past the hamlets between Nice and Genoa have been the objects of deep interest, prayer, and effort, on a small scale, on the part of several Christians. The soil, however, seemed hard and ungenerous, and little fruit was gathered as the result. The state of matters has recently changed for the better. Bordighera, Borghetto, Vallebrosia, San Biagio, Campo Rosso, Dolce Acqua, Ventimiglia, San Remo, and other beautiful spots studding the shore of the Western Riviera, are the scenes of active and interesting evangelistic work; on a small scale, certainly, for the simple reason that the demand for evangelists cannot be met, there being none to send. The leading instrument in God's hand for the bringing about of this revival is a Signor L., proprietor of one of the favourite hotels along the road; an earnest, devoted Christian, whose heart is full of zeal and love, and whose head is cool and clear. A colporteur, called Virgilio, visits all the villages on the coast, and meets with great encouragement from the people, who purchase readily and largely of his stock of books, which embraces the best of those now circulating from the Florence Evangelical press all over the land. An English lady—whose delight it is to labour for Christ at home, among various classes of the community, and whose earnest and unassuming revival labours God has greatly blessed—was led, in God's providence, to these parts last winter, and speaking the Italian fluently, and loving immortal souls, was made serviceable in aiding the very commencement of this work, which is now extending rapidly. This friend thus narrates the first steps taken:—

In January last, we spent about a fortnight at B—, on our way to San Remo. Our hotel-keeper, Mr. L—, is much interested in the work of evangelization. He told us that there was a little band of converts, amounting to, perhaps, eighteen or twenty, scattered in the neighbouring valleys, who had been brought to a knowledge of the truth three or four years ago, through the instrumentality of copies of the Scriptures brought thither by colporteurs. They had had no external help or teaching, except by means of an occasional colporteur, since. Nevertheless, they had kept steadfast in the faith, and met from time to time in each other's houses to read the Word, despite the opposition of neighbours and friends. It was thought that it would be desirable to gather together some of these poor people during our stay, and that I should read the Scriptures with them and speak to them, as I had been accustomed to do at my own little meetings at home. One of their number, who is the syndic of one of the valleys, offered a room in his house for the purpose, and on Sunday afternoon I went there, accompanied by Mr. L—. About twelve persons assembled in that little upper chamber, and Mr. L—, at my request, opened the meeting with prayer. I then read and spoke on the 3rd chapter of St. John. Most of them had Bibles and Testaments, and carefully looked out the passages referred to. After Mr. L— had closed with prayer, he asked if they would meet together on succeeding Sundays in the same manner. Gladly and thankfully was the offer accepted, and the syndic having offered the use of his room, it was agreed that Mr. L— should continue the meeting regularly. He occasionally came to see us at San Remo, and gave cheering accounts of the readiness of the people to come and hear the Word. Meanwhile, an invalid friend at San Remo offered to aid in establishing a colporteur in the district, in the event of there being an opening for one. The offer was accepted, the necessary inquiries were made, and in the course of a few weeks we heard, through Miss Burton, of a man who seemed likely to suit. He was a Tuscan, who had been employed in that capacity for some time at Naples, till disabled by illness. It was arranged that he should come to San Remo at once, and that Mr. L— should act as superintendent. The night before we left San Remo we had a delightful little gathering at our hotel. Mr. L— had come over from B— with some of the members of the little congregation there, who wished to bid us good-bye, and in the evening they met in our sitting-room. The colporteur was also present and two of the "navvies" employed on the new railway making there. I had been in the habit of going among these men and distributing portions of the Scriptures, after ascertaining that they could read, and that they really wished to have them. The two men in question, who were Lombards, and had served under Garibaldi, had expressed a great wish to have "the whole book," and seemed particularly delighted with my reference Bible, which they asked permission to examine, when I went to read with them and a few others at their lodgings on Sunday afternoons. At the little meeting above referred to, Mr. L— read and expounded the Scriptures, and all present seemed much interested, including the mistress of the hotel, and some of the servants, whom we had invited to join us.

I continue to receive from Mr. L— interesting accounts of the progress of the work. At Ventimiglia great eagerness has been manifested to become possessed of the Word of God, and when the priests tried to interfere, the people took the part of the colporteur. He was summoned to appear before the authorities; but after examining his papers and books, they informed him that he was perfectly at liberty to dispense the books in any way that he thought proper. He sold many to the soldiers in the fortress. On one occasion a monk had an argument with him and ended by telling the colporteur that what he said and believed was quite true. Many clergymen were also anxious to have the books. He visited the village of Campo Rosso on the occasion of the feast of San Marco, when the desire for the Word what he had entirely interrupted the ceremony. He was entrapped into a room, and assailed by the priest and some other persons; but young men came to his aid and brought him to the public square, where the syndic gave him protection, and told him he was there at liberty to sell his books. The priest did not appear again, and he was invited to visit some other villages. The demand for Testaments, and tracts, became very great, that a fresh supply from Florence was welcomed. The colporteur began his tour about the middle of April, and on May 1st Mr. L— writes to say that the work had increased so rapidly that there was urgent need of an evangelist. He was then about to hire, at Ventimiglia, capable of containing 300 persons, and he expected the crowd would be very large. He was anxious to have a réunion at San Remo, but without further help it seems impossible. He says: "Let us pray the Lord to show what we are to do with this immense multitude which is almost without labourers. Great openings are opening before us, let us seek to enter."

In another letter, written a month later, he says:—

They say the country is upset by our preaching the Gospel. I have been to Dolceacqua again to-night. R— (the colporteur) at Pigna and Castel Vittoria on the day of Corpus Domini. There was the usual procession and he would not take off his hat. A disturbance ensued, and the syndic and his guard called in. On hearing this I went to the Procureur du Roi, at San Remo, and also the Chief of the Police. They would at once put the priest and eight of his companions in prison, but I asked that they only should be warned for the future. They were all taken down and appear before the Procureur at San Remo, and receive his admonition. The Chief of Police told me that he would give orders where that we should have full liberty to sell our books. We find some good men everywhere and a great many are looking for the true Gospel; but we want an evangelist. R— is going to-morrow to Oneglia, Alasio, and Finale.

It is very sad that no tried and trustworthy herald of the cross is to be found such an auspicious opening as this; and your readers will, I am sure, plead with me to bless abundantly.

GERMANY.

ADDRESS OF DR. ROTHE AT EISENACH.

When speaking to you in my last letter of the general meeting of the Protestant Society (protestanten Verein), I made an allusion to an address by Dr. Rothe, of Heidelberg, as the most salient manifestation of the idea of a society; and I expressed a wish to return the address, after having become acquainted with it. If I do so now it is because I see therein a means of informing your readers of the current of ideas very widely diffused in Germany, outside of what they agree to call clerical orthodoxy. And moreover, it must not be forgotten that Dr. Rothe is one of the most eminent and most rightly influential men among the theologians of our time. He has himself summed up his address at Eisenach in five theses, which very much facilitate the analysis of it. It is, then, his own address which I am going to communicate to you in the following points.

1. It is a fact which is unhappily indubitable that masses—whole classes of our Protestant population—have become strangers to the Church, while no one is able to infer therefrom that the greater number among them have denied Christianity and all religious belief. Many are even morally and Christianly superior to multitudes of Christians who from habit are attached to the Church. It is none the less true that there lies in this fact great danger, as well to these people as to the Church itself. To the last, the danger is all the greater that those who have become strangers to it belong by intellectual culture to the best classes. It is therefore the imperious duty of the Church to seek a remedy for this evil, which engages every sincerely Christian heart.

2. This evil cannot be remedied by trifling measures. It must be attacked at the root, and before all things its causes must be sought out. These causes are not in the exceptional moral corruption of our contemporaries. The Church itself ought to ascribe to itself the chief blame, for it fulfils its mission no longer when it ceases to possess the moral power to enter men's hearts and to attach them to it.

3. It is historically evident that the evil pointed out appeared simultaneously with the great transformation of modern literature which characterised the second half of the last century. And it is the fact that the classes of society in which this modern culture prevails, are those which show themselves most estranged from the Church. The Church has been incapable of taking its true position in this new intellectual life; rather, it has set itself in opposition to it, considering it as antichristian. Hence the divorce. Here, also, on both sides, is the remedy and the duty.

4. The present moment offers sufficient conditions for attempting a reconciliation, if on both sides men will seriously apply their hands to the work. What is required in order to this? The Church ought sincerely to form an alliance of peace and friendship with modern culture, under the express condition, however, that this culture should submit to the educative influence of the Spirit of Christ. The Church itself ought to get possession of the intellectual life of our time, and this to purify it and to sanctify it. In order to this it must endeavour to reduce itself to harmony with actual necessities, as well by its teaching as by its constitution. As regards teaching, it must declare Christ to the present generation in its own language—that is to say, through the medium of its sentiments, its mode of thought and of expression, and not in dogmatic forms which belong to the history of a time gone by. What our generation is concerned in is the great and divine facts of sacred history, whereby God has revealed himself to the world. These facts, well attested and well understood, alone answer to the needs of the present times. The Church ought to labour to satisfy those needs, not only by its worship, but by the powerful means of a sound and wholesome literature, and public addresses. It is true that these means impose new duties upon the servants of the Church, and require of them elevated capabilities. As for its constitution, the Church must transform itself in such a way as to give the religious life of the laity its just share of influence—in other words, the Church must cease to be the Church of the clergy that it may become the Church of the flock.

On their side, it behoves the men who have become estranged from the Church to abandon their inactivity. They must learn to appreciate better the real power of religion, of Christianity, of the Church, and of all the moral interests which pertain to it, in relation to society; but they will not do so till they have experienced in themselves personally that power and its indispensable necessity.

5. But, in order to the attainment of this object, there must be, on both sides, those who are impressed with these truths, and who that this Association rests upon the only foundation which can be laid, Jesus Christ, the true Jesus Christ of the New Testament, the alone Head of the Church. Now He has said—and experience everywhere confirms his words—"Without me ye can do nothing."

Another assembly met in the month of June in that same town of Eisenach; it was the annual session of the deputies of consistories, or the ecclesiastical authorities of all the Protestant districts of Germany. This official conference owes its existence to the Kirchentag. At the origination of the Kirchentag, the idea of Von Bethmann Hollweg and of some influential men was to form of it a confederation of all the Protestant churches of Germany, and in order thereto to have represented there our different ecclesiastical governments. This representation has existed ever since, but separated from the Kirchentag properly so called, and it is its meeting which has taken place. From its very nature it is only composed of men standing high in the Church or in science, and notwithstanding this, it does not at all exercise a great influence. Is this because it is official? Whatever the cause, it is scarcely occupied with any but practical objects, or such as relate to the government of the churches. You will judge of this from the subjects which it has handled this year, and which I shall scarcely do more than indicate. The must undergo after their youth with the catechising of you then with the care of the Church, in its relations of charity. It is apparent that on such matters and may be of undoubted utility the source of great aid to churches; and all the lessons of this Conference, although of official persons, are none of our ecclesiastical at

A PASTORAL DEPUTATION PRUSSIA.

A most characteristic tendency to make known the tendencies which dominate the Prussian clergy, has lately occurred. It has produced a great and important assembly in Prussia. Fifty-eight pastors have gathered for a pastoral conference, gathered and obtained the sanction of the King, to present an address which might be described if it had not been published. This address is nothing else but an accusation, couched in the language of prayer, against the Chamber of Deputies, in opposition to the Government. They have said to the King that he had attacked him, and insulted him grossly. They are unwilling to gather up all the poisoned arrows which have been hurled against his Royal ese pastors declare to the King that they have scruples of conscience about continuing to pray, according to the liturgy for public worship, for the Chamber of Deputies. There is a ban upon this Chamber, and can we bless at God has banned?

At what conclusion does the address arrive? At none. The pastors say to the King that they do not wish to give him counsel, but simply to lay their complaint at the foot of his throne. A Rationalistic journal

Berlin asks these pastors who show themselves so impressed with what they call the will of the Chamber, if it is indeed to the King that they ought to go to denounce them. When they have in their parish a notorious sinner, their pastoral duty is to address themselves with their blame to himself, and not to a third party. This journal asks them again whether duelling is not also a violation of the sixth commandment, which says, "Thou shalt not kill," and why have not these pastors protested publicly, according to their duty, when the Prime Minister of the King, in the open Chamber, challenged to a duel a representative of the nation? They kept silence then, and on many other occasions when the commandments of God were violated in spheres more lofty even than the Chamber. From which the same journal concludes, rightly or wrongly, that the request of the fifty-eight pastors was not the act of an enlightened conscience, but a political manifestation, and one of bad politics; for the authors of the address seemed to forget that the representatives of the nation form, according to the constitution, an integral part of the authorities whose defence they undertake with so much zeal. I know not what the authors of the address can reasonably say in reply. But what I well know is, that such manifestations as theirs are most fitted to alienate the present generation from the Gospel which they preach, and to dig yet deeper the abyss which separates this generation from the Church. Is there not here that which may fully justify the views proposed by Dr. Rothe at Eisenach? It must be added that many of the men most enlightened upon our social questions, and belonging to the orthodox party in the Church, have strongly disapproved of the strange address which the King ought not either to have approved or even received.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF JOHN HUSS AT CONSTANCE.

Let us conclude with a more happy idea. The Protestant Church of Constance is preparing to erect a monument to the great forerunner of the Reformation, John Huss, who was, a hundred years before Luther, condemned and burnt in that city. But, happily, it is not a statue which this community thinks of erecting in memory of the holy martyr. It is a church, of which it has much need, that it is going to build outside the city, as near as possible to the place where the pile was raised which consumed the witness for Jesus Christ. In the spring of this year, the council of this Church published an appeal asking the help of the friends of the Gospel, to whom the memory of John Huss and Jerome of Prague is dear and sacred. No doubt this appeal will be heard. The council hoped to lay the foundation-stone of this monumental church on the 6th of July, 1865—that is to say, 450 years after the death of John Huss.

The Turkish Government continues, directly and indirectly, to persecute its Protestant subjects. It is impossible for me, in the brief letters which I write to you from month to month, to picture in living colours the sufferings of God's people in Turkey, or even to allude to all the oppressive and unfriendly acts of the Turkish Government. But I earnestly commend the brief statements which follow to the friends of religious liberty and Protestant Christianity.

For two years past the pashalic of Angora has been the scene of constant attacks upon the Protestant community. These have been represented to Sir Henry Bulwer and to Mr. Stuart, and the facts have been reported to Earl Russell; but in the face of all this the Pasha of that district retains his office, and goes steadily forward in his course of protecting all who persecute Protestants, and abusing all who sympathise with them. I cannot recur now to all the persecutions of the past few years; but the following statement, from the Protestant bookseller at Angora, gives an account of a new persecution at Istanos, an Armenian town of some 4,000 inhabitants, about twenty miles from the city of Angora:—

Angora, May 31, 1865.

Sahag Vartabed, on behalf of the Armenian Bishop of Angora, came to Istanos, on Friday, d'Affaires, his plans failed in every particular, and he remained quiet until the return of Sir Henry Bulwer. Within a week of his return he commenced anew, and Mr. Harootun Minasian was again suddenly seized and thrown into prison. The Porte ignored everything which had been done by Mr. Stuart, and ordered this man to remain in prison until the amount claimed by Stepan Effendi had been paid; he was even put into the criminal prison, with housebreakers and murderers. An appeal was made at once to Sir Henry and Mr. Morris, the American Minister; the money claimed by Stepan Effendi being the property of English and American citizens. I have every reason to believe that both these gentlemen acted with the greatest promptness and decision; for after four days' imprisonment Mr. Harootun was again set at liberty; and Stepan Effendi was given to understand, in a way which he could not fail to comprehend, that he had made a serious blunder in counting upon the aid, or even the silence, of Sir Henry Bulwer. Evidently under the influence of Sir Henry, the Porte has at last given up its attempts to seize this money, and has entered seriously into an investigation of the affairs of the Protestant civil community. It is plainly essential to the very existence of the community that Stepan Effendi should be removed, and a proper man appointed in his place. If I am correctly informed, the native Protestants have now some reason to hope for this result.

PARDON OF THE AUTHORS OF THE SYRIAN MASSACRES.

French intrigue has just gained a great and decisive victory over right and justice in Turkey. If ever there were criminals who deserved death, they were the men who have just obtained from the Porte a full and free pardon. Achmet Pasha, of Damascus, who was executed by Fuad Pasha, was an innocent man in comparison with Kurchid Pasha, of Beyrout, and the others who have just been pardoned. This pardon has been granted nominally at the request of Abd-el-Kadir, but it is universally believed here that he has been, in reality, nothing more than the cat's paw of the French Ambassador. Indeed he is himself little more than a French agent. He has no influence with the Turks, except in which he derives from this relation.

The French are able to control their hostile population of Lebanon through its religious associations; but the Druze and the Mohammedan population has been much more friendly, heretofore, to England than to France. The pardon of these Druze and Turkish criminals through French influence has created great excitement in Constantinople, and it is believed here that it will give to France the complete and absolute control of Mount Lebanon.

ILLNESS OF THE SULTAN.

The Sultan has been very ill; for several days it was generally believed that he was dead. According to Fuad Pasha, his disease was intermittent fever. Aali Pasha said that he had had an attack of inflammation of the bowels, and had been treated with leeches. Reliable physicians have said within a week that he was insane—so far insane, that unless he should die, it would be necessary to depose and confine him. The above statements are strictly true; but whether Fuad Pasha, or Aali Pasha, or the physicians named, are to be believed, I do not know. The only thing which can be regarded as certain is, that the Sultan has been and still is quite ill. The heir to the throne, in case of his death, is Murad Effendi, eldest son of Abdul-Medjid. He is now about twenty-six years old, and has the appearance of a very dissipated man. It is said, however, that he has made some feeble attempts to learn French, and obtain some knowledge of European learning. The accession of this prince to the throne would result in the immediate downfall of Fuad and Aali Pasha, and might possibly improve the state of the country; but it is very difficult to foresee the future of Turkey. The poverty and misery of the people in the interior of the empire is terrible, and their condition is becoming worse. This is a fact which European politicians should understand. The people of the Turkish Empire (a few cities only excepted) are becoming poorer and more wretched every year, less and less able to bear the weight of taxation which is crushing them. I assert this on the very best possible authority, and it can be very easily proved to the satisfaction of any one who is willing to investigate the subject honestly, on the ground.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE ENGLISH MEMORIAL CHURCH.

Not far from the Hotel d'Angleterre—on a most beautiful site, overlooking the Golden Horn and the Bosphorus—the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel are erecting a costly and elegant church, which is called the "Memorial Church." If I rightly understand the merits of the case, this is not the

His Excellency Sir Henry at the Bible Society meeting gave a brief address. The meeting was well attended; the addresses were interesting, and the report of the Committee was encouraging in regard to the progress of the collection, except of Turkey, where the sales of which have almost entirely ceased on account of persecutions of last year. The meeting was presided at the meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Alliance, and the proceedings were very interesting.

THE REV. WILLIAM C

One of the most interesting month has been the presence of Rev. Dr. Goodell, a member of the British community. He has been for forty-three years in the American Board in Constantinople, and old age, making him to return to America, he has spent about ten days in the family, and returns to England, and the British representative to him this testimony and esteem. MONGOLIA.

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

The National Bible Society of Scotland in China a special agent—the Rev. A. Williamson—who, in furtherance of the society's objects, has visited Mongolia, accompanied by his brother (one of the missionaries of the London Society), and a collector. We cull a few passages from his interesting journal, which commences with his departure from Peking, and narrates his ventures till reaching Lama Mian Kalgan, and thence back to the Chinese capital. On the first day they met a devotee on his way to the capital, measuring the road with his staff. He wore a leathern apron, and leathern slippers, to prevent his arms being skinned. He laid himself flat upon his face, measured the distance, then rose up and placed his feet where his head had been. Thus he had travelled for hundreds of miles.

On reaching Jeh-hol, which is described as a gentler than a trading city, and having a great proportion of educated men, he sold," says Mr. Williamson, "an immense number of books ; could not give them out fast enough. Darkness, however, was an end to it." Next day, taking with him some copies of the Scriptures, he visited the temples in the city, and came in contact with some of the well-to-do priests :—

Immediately on showing the books they were wanted eagerly. One priest took tract after tract, and read it right off, and so did others. I did not anticipate being able to sell ; but seeing their eagerness, I put a price on the books, and sold about sixty in a few minutes. I then sold the Testaments and Bibles for sale. A young man of each was asked by a young man to show him the head Lama. I gave them to him. He took them in. By and by I was invited to the inner temple, into the presence of the great man. He was sitting on his Kang, with his sacred robes before him. He received me with great kindness and frankness ; asked me to sit down, and ordered tea. He inquired about the books in good Mandarin colloquial. He then asked me the price, and, after trying to beat it down, he, to my joy, bought a full Bible. A young man in whom he manifested a very peculiar interest was anxious for a Testament. He then bought a Testament for him. Leaving him with kind feelings, I went to the other head temple, who apparently lives in the inside of the temple. I sent a Testament in for him to read, and he bought it. A priest travelled to our camp the evening, and bought a Testament.

In the streets of Jeh-hol—

There was a demand for books as at times something else. Three of us could not sell fast enough.

The crowd surged and heaved, and several times nearly overflowed us altogether. They bought all our high-priced books, and asked for scientific works. Several respectable persons called upon us. The chief among the Mohammedans paid his respects. He was a very aged man—I forget how old—and was led by a youth. He told us that there were 500 families of his persuasion in the city, and two mosques. They were on the best of terms with the other citizens. Here, as everywhere we have been in China, the Mohammedans claim a sort of connexion with us. They affirm that their religion is the same as ours. They worship the living and true God, and have no idols, and say, "We are entirely different from these base and stupid idolaters."

At Dolannor, one of the chief cities in Mongolia, Mr. Williamson again entered the Buddhist temples, and offered the Scriptures for sale. He thus describes the interior of one temple he visited :—

On each side of the main door stood one great machine, like some huge barrel for crockery ware, and two lesser ones of the same description, six in all. Entering, we found the inside of the temple not unlike a Gothic building. One long wide aisle ran up the centre, and parallel with it, and on either side, were rows of pillars ; these pillars were draped with silk, and hung with pictures of various devices. Right in front stood the chief idol, with lesser idols at the right and left. Before the idols was a long table, on which were spread a great variety of grain, cups of cold water, and several kinds of food. By the time we reached the temple the priests were all in their places, in parallel rows. The elderly priests sat facing each other on each side of the aisle. The junior priests in rows behind them ; and rows of boy priests behind all. Those who sat in the aisle had instruments, and they played and chanted in a way that I never had even dreamed of. The instruments were of the most extraordinary kind. They had buffalo horns and bugles ; drums of all sizes—some so big, that a man might live in one—cymbals, bells, flutes, whistles, and I know not how many other kinds. But the crowning wonder to me was two trumpets, each of them about twelve feet long, with a mouth of two feet in diameter. How could they play such gigantic instruments, do you ask ? They had them arranged on small carriages, like guns. The players reclined upon the ground, and when they had finished blowing, they pushed their roaring trumpets away from them, and rested till their turn came again. The wheels appeared to be well oiled, they went so easily. Notwithstanding the heterogeneous mixture of instruments, the music was capital, and sometimes almost overpowering. There were two chief priests, who alternately took the position of leader, and by the waving of their hands and gestures of their bodies led the ceremonies. They were dressed in beautiful yellow robes, with gorgeous helmets. While standing at the door, coolies, with large pails of weak tea,

About four hundred priests were thus engaged :—

There are 2,300 connected with the temple, but all were not present. After they had finished, I expected they would buy ; but they were neither so intelligent nor well to do as their fellows at Jeh-hol. Indeed, they were very much inferior in dress, demeanour, and everything. They gathered round and bought four or five tracts, but that was all. This, however, was compensated for. I came upon a place where trading Mongols lived. They bought books and Bibles at once, and I sold a good many. It was getting well on in the day,

AMERICA.

COUNCIL OF CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

The delegates of three thousand of the Congregational Churches in the United States have met in the City of Boston, and taken upon themselves the great enterprise of sending the Gospel to those Southern States from which hitherto they have been excluded because of their determined hostility to slavery. They have resolved to raise 750,000 dollars, to be divided between Home Missions, the American Home Missionary Association, and chapel building. A number of most interesting questions came up before the Council, such as a declaration of faith, which was accepted, apparently, without difficulty, ministerial support, the education of the ministry, church building, parochial evangelization, systematising benevolent contributions, the relation of the Orthodox Congregationalists to the Unitarian body, tema number of passages opinion to the Norther of the war had Vaughan's eloquent sp disarmed the Council, feeling once more flow towards their brethrer Boston Congregationalist from abroad have den themselves in such a themselves not to the the churches and the co Dr. J. P. Thompson, o the Patriot respecting Vaughan and Raleigh, in the session these he presented to the Coun was most cordial. In admitted themselves wi of our common ancestors, and especially at the studied silence of your Union upon the great moral issues involved in our war. The policy of the committee of your Union has placed you in a false attitude before the American people, and has cost you a loss of moral power which you may never be able to regain. It was a very great mistake. We felt it at the time; it is your turn to feel it now. As I pointed out its injustice then, I have earned the right to speak frankly of its mischievous effects. The report referred to called out, at first, some very sharp criticism upon the course of England during the war. But better counsels prevailed, and the Council were as magnanimous to overlook as they had been frank in complaining. Dr. Vaughan was again heard; and his manly exposition of the true English feeling was received with rounds of applause. Mr. Beecher then rose, and, after bantering his English friends upon their slight experience of what he had to endure so largely in England, he poured forth the torrents of his noble soul in a welcome of surpassing eloquence; and when, at the close, he gave Drs. Vaughan and Raleigh the hand of fellowship, the whole assembly rose, and at the cry "England and America one for ever!" cheer after cheer went up, until the enthusiasm found vent in a grand doxology.

Referring to the declaration of faith and polity adopted by the Council, Dr. Thompson writes: Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, submitted to the Council an elaborate and exceedingly valuable digest of the principles and usages of our churches, designed, not as a code of laws, but as a manual for reference. This having been approved in substance by the Council, will be published under the supervision of an able committee. When issued, it may afford some useful hints to our brethren in England, as well as much valuable information touching the followers of John Robinson in America. A Declaration of Faith was submitted to the Council, not with a view to its adoption as a standard—much less to its imposition upon the churches—but simply as a testimony to the unity of belief among ourselves in all essentials of Christian doctrine, and as an expression of fellowship with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. This declaration caused much discussion in the Council, and also some verbal controversy. But one day the Council went in a body to Plymouth, the meeting-place of the Pilgrim Fathers; and happy thought occurred to some one of making the declaration to the sacred associations of that place and hour; and there, amid the graves of the Fathers, we adopted the following confession of their faith and polity. The scene, under the open sky and before the sea they traversed in the gloom of winter, was indescribably touching and sublime:—

DECLARATION OF FAITH.

Standing by the rock where the Pilgrims set foot upon those shores, upon the spot where they worshipped God, and among the graves of the early generations, we, elders and messengers of Congregational Churches of the United States, in National Council assembled—like them acknowledging no rule of faith but the Word of God—do now declare our adherence to the faith and order of the apostolic and primitive churches, held by our fathers, and substantially as embodied in the confessions and platforms which our Synods of 1648 and 1680 set forth or reaffirmed. We declare that the experience of the nearly two and a-half centuries which have elapsed since the memorable day when our sires founded here a Christian commonwealth, with all the development of new forms of error since their times, has only deepened our confidence in the faith and polity of those fathers. We bless God for the inheritance of these doctrines. We invoke the help of the Divine Redeemer, that, through the presence of the promised Comforter, He will enable us to transmit them in purity to our children.

In the times that are before us as a nation, times at once of duty and of danger, we rest all our hope in the Gospel of the Son of God. It was the grand peculiarity of our Puritan fathers that they held this Gospel, not merely as the ground of their personal salvation, but as declaring the worth of man by the incarnation and sacrifice of the Son of God; and therefore applied its principles to elevate society, to regulate education, to civilise humanity, to purify law, to reform the Church and the State, to assert and defend liberty; in short, to mould and redeem by its all-transforming energy everything that belongs to man in his individual and social relations.

It was the faith of our fathers that gave us this free land in which we dwell. It is by this faith only that we can transmit to our children a free and happy, because a Christian, commonwealth.

We hold it to be a distinctive excellence of our Congregational system that it exalts that which is more above that which is less important, and by the simplicity of its organization facilitates, in communities where the population is limited, the union of all true believers in one Christian church; and that the division of such communities into several weak and jealous societies, holding the same common faith, is a sin against the unity of the body of Christ, and at once the shame and scandal of Christendom.

We rejoice that, through the influence of our free system of apostolic order, we can hold fellowship with all who acknowledge Christ, and act efficiently in the work of restoring unity to the divided Church, and of bringing back harmony and peace among all "who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

Thus recognising the unity of the Church of Christ in all the world, and knowing that we presence and grace of the Holy Comforter, are delivered from the power of sin and perfected in holiness.

We believe also in an organised and visible Church, in the ministry of the Word, in the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, in the resurrection of the body, and in the final judgment, the issues of which are eternal life and everlasting punishment.

operate with all who hold these we will carry the Gospel to this land, and with them to the world and "preach the Gospel to all creatures." May He to whom "all power is given in heaven and earth" fulfil the promise: "Lo, I am with you unto the end of the world." To the Church for ever. Amen.

CONVOCAATION.

Convocation follows the fortunes of Parliament as a satellite follows the moon. It rises with its rising and sets with its setting. With the decree for the dissolution of the House of Commons goes forth a like sentence on the existence of the clerical assembly; and with the writs for the election of new members to represent the laity, are issued also writs addressed to the several dioceses for the election of new proctors to represent the clergy. And as in the latter days of the lay body considerable activity was evinced, so was it in the two Houses of Convocation. The long-delayed licence to amend and alter the canons that related to clerical subscription was conceded at last, and the alterations were made in due form, with the consent of both Houses. And while the canons were thus under consideration, advantage was taken of the opportunity to give the finishing touch to that long-promised alteration in the canons which would allow parents to act as spon-bound them. This was a technicality, which it was hoped would be slurred over on the last day. It received all due honour and this time it is hoped will be observed of the proctors. It is noticed, that the work which has been more fortunate than the work which will receive the Royal sanction, has been introduced into immediate operation into immediate operation with the sympathy of the Bishops, which both Houses could not have done in their labours of Convocation.

The meetings of this year have taken their place among the best of the land. Licences to preach are granted with so much more liberality than they are now looked upon as a substantive grievance. The refusal would be granted more sparingly; in the case of the ca-

rise in their generation. They themselves are working in their fast, in the meantime, their feet still. Their first object is their footing as one of the titulations of the land; and to public with the holding of Business and action will come overnments will not always be the law officers of the Crown in the meantime they watch for and we may be sure that they gain will not only be tenacious but will become the vantage their forward movement. When said of the Convocation of plies with equal force to the work. The latter body, indeed, under the guidance of the same subtle, daring leader, and would not only to become an aggressive power in the wake of the more influential assembly. As for Ireland, it has no Convocation. It has officially intimated that it is one. Here is one differentiated Church; a difference that lasts as years go on. But we do not see of Convocational independence and would not be at all sorry to see the Church of Ireland removed from the Church of England. The old help to facilitate her fast.

THE BISHOP OF CHESTER.

There was great unanimity of opinion in the Church on the pro-elevation of Dr. Jacobson to the see of Chester. The appointment has been enough to satisfy the organs of the Church. Even the Dissenters claim him, as it appears that he was intended for the ministry of theists, and with that view studied Dr. Pye Smith and the Rev. The appointment which Dr. Jacobson obtained—that of Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford—is to be conferred on the Master of Balliol, and coadjutor in the compilation of Scott's Gaelic Lexicon.

THE CONFERENCE AT NORWICH.

The Conference of Evangelical Clergy was held in the cathedral city of Norwich. It was not admitted, but an authorised proceedings was published in one of the newspapers, from which we learn that among the papers read was one by the Rev. Mr. Garbett, on the inspiration of the Scriptures; one on the present position and duties of the Evangelical body in the Church of Ireland, by the Rev. Mr. Fremantle; one by the Rev. Mr. Harrison, and another by Dr. Robinson, both being on the question of the eternal duration of future punishments. Mr. O'Malley, the Queen's Counsel, also addressed the meeting on the articles, liturgy, and subscription. It would seem that the conversation which followed the reading of these papers did not always rise to the dignity of the subject; but upon the whole there was much harmony in the Conference, and a similar meeting is likely to take place annually.

EXPENSES OF THE COLENSO CONTROVERSY.

The friends of Dr. Colenso are raising a fund to enable him to return to his diocese, which he desires to do, but is prevented by want of funds; his income—notwithstanding the recent decision of the Privy Council, as they say, in his favour—being still withheld from him. Among the members of the committee are Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Jowett, Rev. H. Bristow Wilson, Professor Tyndal, &c.; and among the subscribers are Dean Milman, Dean Stanley, and Dr. Temple. Of the six surviving authors of "Essays and Reviews" three names do not appear—those of the Rev. Mark Pattison, Dr. Rowland Williams, and Mr. Goodwin. The subscriptions received are said to have nearly reached 3,000*l*. But while the Bishop is anxious to return to his diocese, it seems that his clergy there are not at all anxious to receive him. A memorial, signed, we believe, by all the clergy of Natal, has been transmitted to England, expressing their inability to acknowledge Dr. Colenso as their spiritual overseer; and praying the Archbishop of Canterbury to send out, if the forms of the Church will at all allow, another bishop, whom they promise to acknowledge and obey.

While subscriptions are thus sought on behalf of Dr. Colenso, his superior and metropolitan, the Bishop of Cape Town, has applied to the Treasury to defray the expenses he incurred in the late litigation. It seems that in the former proceedings against the Rev. Mr. Long, the Bishop applied to have his expenses defrayed by the Treasury, on the plea that he was only defending the rights which the Crown had conferred upon him by letters patent; and his claim was allowed. It has been renewed on the same ground in the case of the proceedings against Dr. Colenso, but it has met a different fate. The Treasury referred the application to the Colonial-office, and Mr. Cardwell sent it back with the remark, that the Bishop must have known, ever since the decision in Mr. Long's case, how precarious and uncertain the rights conferred by the letters patent were, and that in acting upon them he must be considered to have been proceeding at his own risk. The application was therefore refused.

THE LATE ISAAC TAYLOR.

This gifted author, whose talents through the whole of a long life were dedicated to the service of Christianity, died on the 5th of last month, in the 77th year of his age. Mr. Taylor belonged to a family of authors. His uncle was the editor of Calmet's "Dictionary of the Bible;" his father, his mother, and his sisters, were all writers of considerable force; and hymns for children, written by Ann and Jane Taylor, are to be found in every Sunday-school collection.

Mr. Isaac Taylor himself commenced authorship in 1818, when he became a fellow-labourer with Hall, Foster, and others, in the Eclectic Review. He afterwards published several writings; but it was not till 1829 that a work of his laid hold on public feeling, and compelled men to say that a new and original thinker had arisen among them. This result was achieved by his "Natural History of Enthusiasm," which was published anonymously; and all the critics of the day were instantly set on speculating as to who could be the author. "Fanaticism," "Spiritual Despotism," and other works of a similar class, followed, and maintained the reputation of the author.

Since then, his contributions to our literature have been frequent, and we need mention two, which bore on the question agitated at the time of their appearance, both of which are admitted to have exercised considerable influence on the controversy involved. The first was "Ancient Christianity," intended as an antidote to that unexaltation of patristic literature which was inculcated in the Oxford Tracts. The other was entitled "Restoration of Belief," being historical argument for the truth of Christianity, in opposition to the scepticism of modern literature.

THE PRAYER-BOOK AND THE EVANGELIC ALLIANCE.

A paragraph has appeared in several papers stating that "the Evangelical Alliance has determined to submit the Prayer-book to the 'Nonconformist brethren' for revision, so as to bring it in accordance with Nonconformist views." The Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance have requested us to state that there is no foundation whatever for this report.

TURKEY.

From Cæsarea, in Western Turkey, the missionary of the American Board reports the following facts as having occurred at Chomaklu, a village some twenty miles distant. One man, who became enlightened about three years since, was afterwards joined by three others. These four Protestants were anathematised by the Armenian authorities, who sought to deprive them of their civil as well as their ecclesiastical rights. Anathemas were threatened in case any Armenian should sell to them in the markets even the necessaries of life. A letter conveying this information from the persecuted men—the missionary says—

Was given to the civil head of the Protestant community in Cæsarea, who at once presented the case to the Governor. He drew up a paper, to the effect that the Government knew no difference between the parties concerned, and that the rights of these persecuted men must be respected. This document was served by the civil head, attended by one of our helpers and one of the Government military guard. Such prompt and formal attention of Government authorities at once rectified matters, and secured our end. It is now about a fortnight since the affair occurred. Yesterday they sent us a letter stating that all the members of three families had become Protestants, earnestly entreating us to lend them a helper for a few days, and ordering six spelling-books, as that number of women were desirous of learning to read. Protestantism, and then progress!

From Eastern Turkey, the Rev. Mr. Williams writes to the American Board, respecting a station adjoining his own:—

The "village work" in the region about Kharpoor is a mystery and a marvel to me, for its contrast to all my own missionary experience. Like all the rural populations of Turkey, the people are ground down by oppression and exactions, and are poor—almost all of them would pass for beggars in the United States—living in dirt and want such as you may perhaps be able to conceive, but certainly not the untravelled members of American churches. Yet they already do ach to sustain the Gospel among themselves, and purchase Bibles and books, to an extent which fore my own eyes, is incredible.

There were twenty-nine additions to the church at Kharpoot during the year, and there a native missionary work of great promise. The Theological Seminary here numbers enty-two students, and the day-schools (including adults) upwards of 1,000 pupils. The ms paid by the people for religious and benevolent objects amounted, during the year, to 2 24 dollars (in gold), and would have been larger, had the mass of the people been poor, en for them.

The Rev. Dr. Pratt, writing from Marash, in Central Turkey, to the American Board, fers to "the comparatively good state of the first church, the addition of eighteen members its last communion, which was administered by Rev. Kara Krikor, of Aintab, before an sembly of some 1,500, and the flourishing condition of the second church, which has just lled a pastor."

INDIA.

Sir Herbert Edwardes recently took his seat in committee as a vice-president of the urch Missionary Society. He stated a number of facts showing to what extent activity and ought characterise the present state of India. These features are seen in commercial and ministrative operations, and in the material prosperity of the country. As regarded lucation, he said there was a perfect avidity for learning English. Self-interest, as usual, as at the bottom of it. Some years ago, a native pupil in the Peshawur Mission School rote in his copy-book that "Knowledge was the root of all money," and now-a-days know-dge of English is found to be the root of all employment in the judicial and railway partments. As to the religions of the country, both Mohammedans and Hindus were gitated by reforming movements, though of widely different character :—

The Mohammedan reform was an aggressive movement. Its authors were the Wahabis, ho strove to revive the Koran in all its strictness and bigotry. They called on the loem to lay aside all worship of saints and relics; to cease to attribute to them the owers of healing and of miracles, which belonged only to the one Creator; and to aw off from all connexion with infidels. This latter doctrine is aimed at the English, ad has already produced much political trouble. A crescentade has been preached brought throughout the villages of Bengal; hundreds of disciples have been deluded into leaving heir country, and going to a Wahabi colony in Afghanistan, beyond the British border; hence to make attacks upon the British Government at feasible moments, and unsettle the mind f India. The Hindu reformers—the Brahma Somāj—were not actuated by hostility to the nglish. On the contrary, they had learned from the English to reform manners and customs, ject caste, and many obnoxious usages. So earnest are they, that they send out their ablest en to Madras and Bombay, to spread the movement; and though they do not admit that they are drawn their inspiration from anywhere but their own ancient books, Sir Herbert considered the greatest homage to Christianity that had yet been paid in India. On the whole, he regarded the activity of thought now to be seen in India as most hopeful for mission work. fforts should be doubled, not relaxed, at such a crisis; and education, both religious and secular, ould be helped by all as a powerful agency for good. He hoped and believed we might all live o see Christianity indigenous in India.

Dr. Mullens, now presiding over the London Society's Educational Institute at hownipore, near Calcutta, has been called home by the directors to become the colleague f Dr. Tidman in the society's Foreign Secretariat. The Educational Institute is making, n several respects, unusual progress. Dr. Mullens writes :—

We have added nearly a hundred scholars to our list, and have reached the highest point in umbers that the institution has ever attained. The class-roll shows 623 scholars at Bhowanipore, ad 192 in the branch school at Behala. Once before we had 620 scholars at Bhowanipore. This was in 1851, just before we laid the foundation of the new institution, and before the baptism of he six converts who were the first-fruits of that harvest of blessing since reaped by the mission. Their baptism deprived us at once of three hundred of our most promising scholars. gain the numbers rose from three hundred to four hundred; again the baptism of five additional verts half emptied the institution, and left us lower than before. So we went on for several ears. In those days, too, we charged no fees, but the education we gave was free. Now we charge es from two shillings a-month down to one shilling. We still baptize converts; but never a ord is said, nor do our scholars leave us.

The Association of native Christians belonging to villages to the south of Calcutta, and onected with the Baptist mission, have held their second anniversary. No European mis-ionary was present, and the proceedings are reported by the native pastor who acted as hairman. After the presentation of reports from some half-dozen churches, eleven persons who had been prepared were baptized. On a subsequent day (the first of the Bengali year), April 12, the people of the place held a sort of Easter festival, engaged in religious services,

On being reminded of it, he tried to say something about the transaction, but he begged him not to give it a thought, but to think of the account he had heard of. On hearing this, the good old man started for a moment with surprise, and, he exclaimed, "Oh, that account has been settled long ago: there is no more (upwards) against me now; it has all been paid for me by Jesus Christ. While there that can condemn me? He died and rose again, and is even now a Father for me." Then, stretching forward both his hands, he added, "Do me up in His arms before the throne of His Father?"

The Rev. Mr. Noyes, of Periakulam, Madura mission of the A. S. Church, in his recent letter, mentions the following case, "to show how much it sometimes costs people to become Christians, and how difficult it is, in India, to obtain and oppress":—

One congregation has been nearly broken up by persecution. A few years ago, in a highly prosperous state. Accessions were being numbered by scores, steps were being taken for building a new church, and the catechist and the older members were in a state of prosperity. The zemindar, however, provoked the jealousy and hatred of an old enemy. The zemindar (practically) has the power of a despot, determined to break up the congregation. One of the more influential members was falsely accused of a gross crime, summarily arrested, and under an escort of police peons, marched off to the office of a native magister, where he was kept for ten days without trial, under the custody of peons, and then released. He could be proved against him. His enemies well knew, from the first, that he could not be made out against him; but for the time, and long enough to bring upon the accused and his religion, the native authorities were made too much for. The purposes of the zemindar and to intimidate those who had lately joined, did the enemy stop here. The new members were taken to the zemindar's house, beaten, fined, and forced to rub the sacred ashes on their foreheads, as an excommunication of the Christian religion.

From Travancore, the Rev. F. Baylis, of the London Society, reports the progress of native evangelization in villages and by the wayside, in one division of the mission. Besides additions to most of the congregations, the formation of three new ones, 228 adults, and 125 children. Eleven places for devil-worship, three of large size and better build than ordinary, have been destroyed, with the owners, and the implements of worship, clubs, spears, &c., given up.

Of the progress of the Chumba mission, which originated under the auspices of the A. S. Church, already known to our readers, the founder, the Rev. W. Ferguson,

Since 18th October, 1863, fifty-four persons in all have been baptized. In the last three weeks, and I hope to baptize five more to-morrow. Such things now, that the baptismal font is filled with water every Lord's-day, and dispensed on the last Sunday of each month. I am anxious to encourage the women, and children—to learn to read. But I find that poor, rather indolent at 150 miles of their journey they travelled on unfrequented roads, in order to avoid the direct road through the Khyber Pass, which, although less than half that distance from Peshawur, was felt to be impracticable for them as Christians. Their great source of danger was being recognised by men whom they had met on British territory; and such they repeatedly saw, but they succeeded, in every instance, in either evading or conciliating them.

At Nurgul they found the people expecting an attack from Kafirs. Nothing could be obtained from them, but here again their medicines came to their aid when in difficulties. A man was ill with fever: they gave him an emetic, and then quinine, which cured him, and he then brought out both opium and cheese. They here bound five skins together, and, seated on their raft, descended the stream to Tangai, and then went on to Bariabad, in Ningrahar, where five students and sepoys from Pusufzie, who knew them well, were sitting in a mosque, as they entered the village. They were fired without observation, and, meeting a man outside the village with camels and covered jowas, such as are used by veiled women on their journeys, they bargained with him to take them, concealed as women, to Jelalabad, giving as the reason that they had enemies in the neighbourhood whom they wished to avoid. They have often spoken since of this narrow escape, feeling at they were then in very great danger of life indeed.

In another case, they were in peril of recognition by two discharged soldiers—Affghans—who are described as being—

Bold, unscrupulous, reckless of life, whether of others or their own, clever, fertile in resource, and nature rogues who fear neither God nor man, though they pray five times a-day, and would, some of them, sooner die than break their appointed fasts. How to avoid these men, and pass through their villages unseen, was a question requiring deliberation. At last they agreed to travel in women's attire, and cover their faces with burkas. Three guides were hired to defend and conduct them, and they hired a private apartment at Mulayan for them, as for women, and cooked their food; but, to their dismay, having brought them to the village, they refused to take them further, and it was no pleasant prospect for them to be found there at all, much less in this disguise. Some Affghan Christian travellers gave themselves to prayer, and, for a consideration, three guides last agreed to accompany them to the next village, Niyazi, where they assumed their own proper dress.

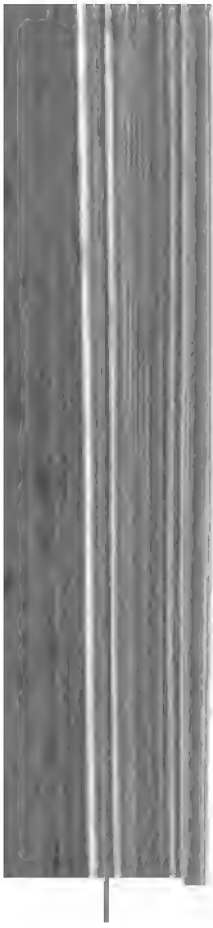

At length they reached their destination, but Ghara, the Kafir sepoy who had invited them thither, was absent. They, however, sent for him, and were awaiting his arrival, when a woman suffering from sore eyes was cured by them. Immediately the whole village sought out their sick to be healed. Six men out of eleven were cured of fever, and the people became most friendly. Ghara lost no time in joining them, being, in fact, apprehensive that they might be killed, inasmuch as they were of the race and wore the garb of their mortal enemies. Of the ferocity with which those enemies are treated they had a fearful illustration at Nikera, on the tops of the mountains, where they saw a party of twenty-eight Mussulmans hospitably entertained at a feast and dance, and then suddenly in cold blood each treacherously seized and murdered, in revenge for the death of some Kafirs slain by their sinners some years before. They were hospitably entertained at Ghara's own village, Shaidralain, and received many visitors, with whom they conversed upon religion. Missionary work, indeed, had been begun before, for Ghara and his friends had always joined the Affghan evangelists in their morning and evening devotions, and there had been much religious conversation.

But now it was carried on in earnest for the space of some twenty days. All day long, from morning to night, they were talking with the people, and answering questions, and were joined by them in their services; and at night they wrote their journal, giving, in Pushtoo, a full account of all they saw and heard. This journal was written in lime juice, and on their return appeared only blank pages of white paper; but when heated over the fire they gradually darkened, and assumed their proper shape. All applauded as Ghara translated the words they spoke. At times the whole village, men, women, and children, were assembled.

The snows were beginning to fall, when the two native missionaries thought it their duty to bend their steps homewards. They took with them a letter to the missionary at Peshawur, begging that they might be allowed to return this summer, promising protection, and asking his prayers. Ghara and many other Kafirs accompanied them on their journey for four days. They had afterwards two narrow escapes from the Imaun of a mosque in Peshawur, whom they with difficulty avoided, and from a student, who recognised them, but was persuaded to keep their secret. They at length reached home in safety. The difficult and self-denying task thus accomplished by these brethren suggests to the missionaries at Peshawur that a few good Affghan Christians may probably do more to disseminate the truth than hundreds of the tamer races who live in India below them.

THIBET.

Two Moravian missionaries who had taken up their temporary abode upon the borders of Thibet remain there for the present. One of them, the Rev. Mr. Jaeschke, who is

The Committee of the Bible Society publish a letter received from a Malagasy Christian, gratefully acknowledging the receipt of a small grant of Scriptures for his own use, as well as for distribution. The Christian in question is the Malagasy Minister for Foreign Affairs.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The Rev. Mr. Lindley, of the Inanda Zulu mission, mentions the reception into the fellowship of the Church of twelve new members. "These additions," he says, "with the exception of one or two, are the result of a precious little revival with which we were blessed some five months ago. Three of these new members were baptized in infancy, as the children of pious parents, and are the first-fruits of infant baptism in our mission."

WEST INDIES.

We observe a second instance, within the last few months, in Hayti, of a Romanist presiding over a Protestant missionary meeting. At a recent Wesleyan missionary meeting, at Port-au-Prince, General Bance, ex-Secretary of State, occupied the chair. He made an excellent introductory speech, in the course of which he said that although a Roman Catholic, he, after due reflection on the subject, felt that he could consistently occupy his position as chairman of the meeting, and wish well to the society in question.

MEXICO.

A missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America writes from Vera Cruz that the services of that church have been celebrated there for the first time in the Spanish language. All the accounts from Mexico state that the opening for Protestantism has never been so bright as at present.

LABRADOR AND GREENLAND.

The Moravian missionary ship Harmony left the Thames on the 20th June, on her annual voyage to Greenland and Labrador. She carried five missionaries, two of them, after a visit to Europe, returning to the field in which they have laboured for a period of nineteen years, the remaining three going out for the first time. They were accompanied by two gentlemen, members of the Society of Friends, who are desirous of paying a visit of Christian sympathy to the brethren in Christ in that dreary region. A meeting was held on board two or three days previous to the Harmony setting out on her voyage, when the ship, with her precious cargo, her crew and passengers, was commended to the gracious care and guidance of Him whom winds and waves obey; and the company present united in praising the past mercies vouchsafed by the Lord God to the little missionary vessel which, for almost a century, has been the instrument by which alone the communication has been kept up between Labrador and the Church at home. For ninety-five years the Moravian missionary ship has performed an annual voyage to that dangerous and inhospitable coast (the present vessel being the ninth that has been employed in the service), and during all this time no serious accident has ever befallen her, nor has there been any loss of life among crew or passengers. In view of this proof of God's power and mercy, the Christian friends, assembled on the deck of the Harmony, could not do otherwise than praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men.

NEW ZEALAND.

We have full details of the shocking murder of the Rev. C. S. Volkner by the natives, which confirm the brief account published in our June number (p. 310):—

Mr. Volkner had lately taken his wife to Auckland, and, in company with the Rev. T. S. Grace, Church missionary at Taupo, arrived at Opotiki on the 1st of March, in a small schooner, the Eclipse, commanded by a Jew named Levy, who was in the habit of trading there, his brother being a resident storekeeper. The natives were found to be in a state of considerable excitement in consequence of the appearance of a party of Taranaki Hauhaus a few days previously, having with them the preserved head of Mr. Hewitt (murdered at Wanganui), another of a soldier of the 70th Regiment killed at Taranaki, and a captured soldier of the 57th. The whole settlement had in a few days renounced Christianity and become converts to the new religion. The Eclipse had no sooner entered the river than she was seized, the crew and passengers being ordered on shore and confined in a native "wharre." Captain Levy, being a Jew, was unmolested, the Hauhaus laying claim to be in some way allied to the ancient people of God. The cargo of the vessel was next brought on shore and partially distributed, that belonging to the two Levys being handed over to them. On the following morning a fall and tackle was procured from the schooner the natives on the escape of Mr. Grace, and they immediately rushed down they expected to be able to intercept the boat. They were, however, several shots at the crew, but none of them took effect, and Mr. Grace was board Her Majesty's steamer Eclipse. Fears being entertained for the safe Waiapu (Williams), who lives with a few settlers, at his mission station, about Opotiki, the Eclipse accordingly proceeded to Turanga, not far from which Williams resides. Turanga must be confounded with Tauranga. The place Williams lives, is in the Bay of Poverty, near Napier, while the latter, where was sustained, is in the Bay of Plenty, near Auckland. The fears were not deriders having already arrived with the preserved heads and soldier prisoners settlement; but as the Turanga natives were eager to turn them back, the impression that the Turanga party, accompanied by Bishop Williams and it would succeed in their object. This anticipation was not, however, realised, speedily succeeded in so far bringing over the Bishop's allies as to induce the his lordship's influence, becoming daily less and less, was at last insufficient tinning on the station. After having been compelled to keep constantly on and night, he and a few settlers took refuge in a couple of coasting vessels, a land. Archdeacon W. L. Williams and Rev. S. Williams, with three or four ever, at the risk of their lives remained behind to watch proceedings and ender wanton destruction of the mission property, which now almost wholly represents years.

In the course of a letter of thanks to the Provincial Government after effecting his liberation, the Rev. T. S. Grace writes:—

I feel very grateful to the various congregations of the Church, and those and around Auckland, for their united and earnest prayer to Almighty God for fifteen days of anxious suspense, made doubly bitter by daily persecution. I was supported by the prayers of others; and while reading those words of "The fierceness of men shall turn to thy praise, and the fierceness of them I felt sure that it would be even so. The fiat of Him who hears prayer "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further," &c. These fierce persecutors, the day before my escape I had reason to tremble lest, in their excitement and from been offered a sacrifice to their god, as they consecrated a newly-erected place of worship, like threatening waves, had been rolled back four miles up the place moment they were wanted on the spot to keep me secure, like the keepers asleep, and at a distance; and while I was able to rejoice in the words I had read, "The proud are robbed; they have slept their sleep, and all the men whose have found nothing"—they were gnashing their teeth with rage because I was between this case and the death of James and the deliverance of Peter, in answer prayers of the Church for him, is so striking, that I cannot help referring to it that, "one has been taken, and the other left." Yes, the one most fitted for the most unworthy has been left. There was a moment on the morning of the escape had a hope from human aid, but that failing, my dear brother said, "We That trust never failed him, and I rejoice in being able to say that his last hope was led away from me unconscious that it was to death, and when made:

The Samoan mission of the London Society is reported as being in a prosperous condition; but there is opposition from the Roman Catholic priests, who employ a native agency gathered from expelled church members. They find it hard work, however, there, elsewhere, to make much way among a Bible-reading people. Already 1,500*l.* worth of copies of a new edition of the Bible have been disposed of among the Samoans. Notwithstanding the assertion sometimes confidently made, that the natives of the South Sea Islands are dwindling away, it appears that there has been an increase of about 1,000 in the population of Samoa in the last seven years. The Samoan Mission Seminary has just completed the twentieth year of its existence. Most of the Samoan villages are now under the care of young men who have been educated there; and the institution has its representatives also in various other groups. There are now eighty-seven young men under its care, who, with the wives of sixty of them who are married, and also their children, make up a total of 245 individuals. This enables the missionaries to send out about twenty fresh men every year; and that is found barely sufficient to meet the ever-recurring wants occasioned by deaths and disabilities. The missionaries state that—

The small thatch-enclosed houses in which the first class of students were lodged in 1844 have given place to fourteen stone-walled cottages ranged on either side of our large class-room; and we have in addition twelve weather-boarded, and other inferior houses, which will be superseded in due course, we trust, by better buildings. The young men still devote the Wednesday of each week to the work of house-building and other improvements; and to this arrangement we are indebted for the present changed aspect of the place, compared with the time, twenty years ago, when it was an uninhabited bush. Additions have been made from time to time to the land which we originally bought, and the whole now extends to about sixty acres, which the students cultivate during exercise-hours, and thus provide by their own industry for the daily wants of their table.

Literature.

A Revision of the Authorized English Versions of the Book of Psalms. With Notes, Original and Selected. By the Rev. JOHN NOBLE COLEMAN, M.A. Nisbet and Co.

In addition to what we have here set down, the title-page informs us that the work vindicates, "in accordance with the interpretation of the New Testament, and with pre-Reformation authorities, their prophetic manifestation of Messiah, the Alpha and Omega, the Shepherd, Prophet, Priest, and King, the Pattern and Exemplar of all the blood-bought sheep of Immanuel of every age and of every clime." The preface sets forth the manifold excellences of the Psalms, states the causes why some of them are obscure to the English reader, and suggests the Messianic interpretation of them. It states, moreover, the changes into which the commentators may be arranged. Other topics are also touched upon, including a consideration of the state of the text, the Masoretic punctuation, the Hebrew titles to the Psalms, &c. The author gives us lists of his authorities, an outline of his plan, and a list of various readings. His preliminary matter ends with the last words of David, as found in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—8. The whole of the Psalms are arranged in parallelisms, as all the poetical portions of Scripture should be. To each is prefixed a summary of the contents, as understood by Mr. Coleman. The translation is accompanied by copious notes of two kinds—the first critical, and the second expository and illustrative. There are some exceptions to this mode of treatment, but the rule is that which we have described. Considerable pains have been taken to show the proper arrangement of the Psalms, and all the notes indicate careful and extensive reading. The book is a handsome one, and embodies a large amount of useful matter. There are two points, however, which call for a remark. The first is, that exclusive and comprehensive (for it is both an exclusive and a comprehensive) application of the Psalms which makes them prophetic of Christ and His Church. Now, we cannot persuade ourselves that all the Psalms are, more or less directly, Messianic. Some of them are unquestionably so, and the Messianic element may be more widely diffused than many suppose, but we are unable to go the length of Mr. Coleman. The Messianic applications of certain Psalms in the New Testament do not establish his principle, nor can it be established throughout without a style of interpretation which criticism must reject, whatever pious exegesis may say. This brings us to our second point, which is the peculiar critical interpretation which the author is oftentimes compelled to adopt, and which develops startling results only by proceeding on principles which are rather arbitrary than scientific. It is arbitrary to divide Psalm cii., for example, so that v. 1—24 shall be a "prayer to Messiah, the Jehovah of this Psalm," and v. 25—28, the "voice of God the Father unto God the Son." Nor is it only in the division and distribution of Psalms that this appears: it is seen in the translation and application of words, and in the very pointing of the sentences. We can only say that such liberties are not generally conceded, and that if they were, other men might on the same essential maxims found a version and exposition of the Psalms which would shock us all. We wish to do honour to the author's diligence, piety, and skill, but we are not prepared to endorse the principal or most prominent feature of his book—namely, what we must regard as fanciful criticism, in a Messianic application of all the Psalms; which in our judgment is not justified.

Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah. By JOSEPH ADDISON ALEXANDER, D.D., Princeton. New and Revised Edition. Edinburgh: Andrew Elliot.

THIS is the greatest work of a great man, the "magnum opus" of a lifetime. His colleague, Dr. Hodge, declared of him in the General Assembly of his church in 1860, that "he was incomparably the greatest man he ever knew, incomparably the greatest man his church had ever produced." Those who have read his sermons, or who have made themselves familiar with this commentary on Isaiah, will not consider the eulogium extravagant. This is the kind of book with which ministers of the Gospel in these days should stock their libraries and store their minds. He who shall have thoroughly mastered the contents of such a commentary will himself have made considerable progress towards becoming a superior exegetical scholar. We are by no means disposed to rate Vitrina at so low an estimate as the accomplished editor, Dr. Eadie, has done, but we have no hesitation in affirming that since the colossal commentary of the great Dutchman was given to the Church, nothing so precious has appeared on the prophecies of Isaiah as this work of the Princeton professor. Mr. Elliot is making the British churches his debtor by the judicious reprints which he is sending forth of the best works of American divines, and especially of the various members of the talented family of the Alexanders. The Commentary on the Book of Psalms, by the same author, "Consolation," and "Christian Faith and Practice," by Dr. James W. Alexander, of New York, and "The Evidences of Christianity," by Dr. Archibald Alexander, adapted for schools and Bible-classes by Dr. A. Thomson, of Edinburgh, are among the most valuable of his reprints. We trust that the encouragement given by English readers and students will be such as to induce him to proceed further in the same course.

A Hebrew and Chaldean Lexicon to the Old Testament. With an Introduction, giving a Short History of Hebrew Lexicography. By Dr. JULIUS FUERST. Third Edition, improved and enlarged, containing a Grammatical and Analytical Appendix. Translated from the German, by SAMUEL DAVIDSON, D.D., J.L.D. Williams and Norgate.

THIS work is to consist of twenty shilling parts, the first of which is before us. The translator well known as an able Hebrew and German scholar, and thus far he has performed his task in a very faithful and satisfactory manner. Printing is executed at Leipzig, and is marked by the beauty and accuracy for which Bernal Tauchnitz is famous. Having for a considerable time constantly used Fuerst's Lexicon in German form, we can, without hesitation, end the following remarks, which we copy from the prospectus to this edition: "Since the lexicographical labours of Gesenius, the present work containing many new facts and views, is by the most important in the same department: is especially rich in its comparisons of Aramaean, Arabic, and Targumic dialects; its investigation of the roots of words; its elucidation of difficult passages; and in collation of ancient versions with the works of the Jewish lexicographers. The author has diligently availed himself of all recent investigation in philology, and of the best travels in Palestine: that he has added largely to the materials contained in the Lexicon of Gesenius and Meier. But, as in the case of Gesenius, there will be found in this work many things which call for exercise of judgment on the student's part. Some of the philological principles, some of the mythological allusions, and some of the exegetical notes, justify the remark last made. Nevertheless, the work is one of great and permanent value to all who would investigate the original script of the Old Testament. It may also be observed that the references to texts are very numerous and rare and curious information appears on almost every page. The book will be very cheap, and has so many other recommendations, that we expect there will be a large demand for it. Although called the third edition, it is the first which has appeared in English, but it is called third, owing to its containing a good deal of original matter supplied by the author.

The Adopted Child: a Story Illustrative of the Spirit of Adoption. By the Author of "Katherine Douglas," &c. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

THE title of this story itself indicates the purpose and suggests the spirit of it. In the preface, also, the author informs us that "this narrative is designed to describe the believer's relationship to God: Heavenly Father in Christ Jesus; once as such by nature and by practice, but now a child, reconciled to Him through the atoning blood and merit of Christ Jesus, through whom he has access by the Spirit, and can say 'Abba, Father.' The narrative is also intended to elucidate the truth that, however the feelings of the child may vary, the unchangeable purposes of God in Christ Jesus toward him are unalterable." The objects proposed are steadily kept in view, and are illustrated by the introduction of numerous phases of character and experience. The incidents are verified, the characters interesting, and the tone and spirit of the book eminently Evangelical and practical. We think the idea of embodying doctrine and precept in a narrative form, and so teaching by examples, is a happy one, and we wish it volume success.

Life of John de Wycliffe, with a Sketch of the Ancient British Church and the English Reformation. By the Author of "The Story of Martin Luther." John F. Shaw and Co.

The period over which this book extends reaches from the earliest ages of Christianity in this country down to the issue of the present authorized version of the Bible. The earlier and later portions of this period are briefly treated, but the life of Wycliffe occupies a much larger space. The notices of the early British and Saxon Churches are fair and trustworthy, and the author shows his judgment in estimating as he does the numerous unfounded legends connected with the introduction of the Gospel into this island. There are, however, one or two traditions in which we have much less faith than he has. With regard to the life of Wycliffe, it is written in a plain and agreeable manner, and is better fitted for general reading than more elaborate and larger works on the same subject.

FOREIGN.

THE political tranquillity of France continues unbroken ; and the elections for the municipal offices through the empire serve to show that where the people are not fretted and irritated with official dictation they would, of their own accord, support the institutions of the present dynasty. The period for the election of mayors in the different municipal districts had come round, when intimation was made from the Home-office that the Government did not wish to interfere in the elections, but left the choice to the citizens themselves. The consequence was that in almost every case the persons chosen were known to be favourable to the present Government. Some apprehension was excited by a report of the illness of the Prince Imperial, and Europe was painfully reminded how much its tranquillity depends on the life of one man, and one young child ; but for the present those disquietudes are hushed, as it is announced that the boy has entirely recovered. The Emperor is therefore left free to pursue his plans for the reconstruction of the Algerian Government undisturbed by troubles nearer home. In ecclesiastical matters, the old warfare between Orthodoxy and Rationalism continues to be waged. Our intelligence shows the newest phases of this conflict, which appears to be every day narrowing itself to this one issue of the Bible as a Divine rule of faith and morals, or every man a law to himself.

The Italian Government has just achieved a great diplomatic triumph. The kingdom of Italy has been recognised by Spain—recognised unreservedly, without even those restrictions which Louis Napoleon thought it necessary, for the sake of standing well with the ultra-Catholic subjects, to impose. This step on the part of a country hitherto considered, and justly, as the most devoted to the Romish See in Europe, is likely to have important consequences. The Pope is profoundly afflicted ; he sees in this act the desertion of his cause by a people hitherto the most attached to his interests. Nor has the step been taken without remonstrance. The Spanish bishops have protested almost to a man against such an outrage on their head. The Spanish Government replies by deposing the ring-leaders among these protesters. There remains now only Austria among the leading European Powers by whom the accomplished fact of the Italian kingdom is not recognised ; and Austria is withheld, all the world knows, by political, rather than religious, considerations, while it is expected that under the new Government lately established even Austria will not hold out much longer. In the internal affairs of Italy, it is to be remarked, that general satisfaction is expressed that the negotiations with the Pope have come to an end ; meetings are held all over the country to prevent their renewal. The municipalities withhold their maintenance from the usual Church processions, in revenge for the priests discountenancing the political demonstrations. Everywhere the breach between the people and their old spiritual instructors is widening ; would we could say that other and better instructors are taking their place. As yet, the quarrel is political rather than religious ; but into the issues thus made, truth and light steal their way, and bear fruit. Our correspondent's letter contains an interesting account of one instance of this process, and we believe it is but a specimen of many others.

Germany, whether considered in its political or its religious condition, presents an unsatisfactory aspect. The two great Powers—Prussia and Austria—are as far as ever from an agreement on the policy that ought to be pursued towards the late Danish Duchies; it is said that little more would bring them to downright war. The Prussian Government not content with this foreign dispute, provokes another with its own subjects. The Prussian Chamber of Deputies having refused to sanction the budget proposed by the Minister, the King prorogued them, and has since issued a decree authorising the money to be raised notwithstanding; and calls upon the people to pay the taxes which their own representatives have not voted. The members of the Chamber then proposed to hold a political dinner, which plans of constitutional resistance might be discussed. The dinner was forbidden; those who attended were dispersed by the troops. The King is upheld in this high-handed course of his by a large portion of the Protestant clergy of the country; between fifty and sixty of whom presented him with an address, in which they said that the conduct of the Chamber of Deputies was so bad, in resisting the authority of the Government, that they could not consent to pray for them. It need not be added what a handle this conduct gives, to the correspondents points out, to the enemies of Evangelical religion in Germany, who are unabated as ever in their assaults on the foundations of the Gospel.

We deeply regret to learn that the persecution of the Protestants still continues in Turkey. The letter of our Constantinople correspondent contains several affecting instances of the grievous hardships with which a profession of the Gospel is accompanied in that country, and it is the more painful to reflect that in every case the persecution is supported by other Christian sects—the Roman Catholics or the Armenians—and that the Protestants are but the blind agents of their will. In another matter there is ground for congratulation. It will, perhaps, be remembered that Stepan Effendi, the civil representative of the Protestant community, had been, there was reason to believe, bought over by the other community to betray, or at least to neglect, the interests of his constituents; and a scheme was set on foot to raise a sum of money to induce him to resign his appointment. The money was raised; and the wily Effendi endeavoured to get it into his hands without resigning; and, failing in his object, he sued the holder of the sum, a native Protestant, for what he called the debt. He had influence enough with the Turkish authorities to have him cast into prison. Through the influence of Mr. Stuart, our Chargé d'Affaires, he was released; and matters remained in that state till the return of Sir Henry Bulwer to his post, when, calculating on his connivance, Stepan renewed his suit against the holder of the money. He was disappointed, however, for Sir Henry took the same view of the matter as Mr. Stuart; the prosecution failed: there is now a good prospect of the removal of Stepan from the post he so unworthily holds.

We direct attention to a remarkable communication from China, giving an account of a journey made by an agent of the Scottish National Bible Society, and his brother, a missionary, into the interior of Mongolia, and the success they met with in the sale of copies of the Word of God. The books were everywhere bought with the utmost avidity, and at prices put on them by the vendors. It is probable that nothing more than literary curiosity was at the bottom of this eagerness, but it is impossible to reflect on the dissemination of so many copies of the Divine Book among that benighted population without a yearning prayer to its Author that the entrance of His Word may find light.

The civil war in America is now at an end, and the voice of armed opposition is hushed over the whole continent. The Southern States lie prostrate before their victors, and are constrained perforce to receive that form of constitution which the North may please to impose. The difficulties of the war are over; the difficulties of peace begin. Opposition, however, has disappeared in the field, has sprung up again in the council-chamber and on the platform. The South awaits the impress that shall be given her from the North; but the North is agreed what that impress is to be. President Johnson and his former friends are now in decided opposition. The Democratic party—the men who, all through the war, had a leaning towards the South—distrust him, as a matter of course; but we were not prepared for the vehement attacks made on him by the Republican party—the root and branch men against slavery—whom it was supposed he belonged. But the Republican orators have now made the discovery that, though an abolitionist, he is still an asserter of the rights of the separate States, the Union short of absolute sovereignty; and to the loyal men of each of the Southern States—that is, the men who take the oath of allegiance—he is for committing the task of the reconstruction of their shattered polity. But in their hands the negroes would be made assume a certain position of inferiority ; they would not be entrusted with the franchise. Against such an exclusion the Republican leaders of the North raise their protest ; and in their zeal they go so far as to assert that the palm of victory in the late war is to be assigned to the negro. Such jarring statements are likely to cause trouble for some time to come ; but we doubt not that the energy, the perseverance, and the determination of the American character, which brought the late war to a victorious issue, will triumph over these few obstacles. Everything that occurs, however, seems to show how much the American nation has lost in the murder of President Lincoln, just as he had acquired the confidence of all persons. Several men and one woman were recently hanged for complicity in the crime of his assassination. It may be hoped that their lives will be the only ones sacrificed on the scaffold in expiation of events arising out of the late war.

HOME.

The country has just gone through the excitement of a general election. In one respect there is a great improvement on the system of former times ; for the candidates were elected, and the returns made from the most distant counties, in a period nearly as short as was allowed for a borough polling in the days anterior to the Reform Bill. But in the wild license and uproar that characterised former times we fear there is little change for the better. Drunkenness abounded as much as ever ; the interest taken in the election by the crowds in front of the hustings was most usually exhibited in howls and yells, so impartially distributed, that on neither side could the candidates obtain a hearing ; while in many places on the election day the polling-booths were beset by infuriated mobs, who assaulted the voters for the unpopular candidates, and at times proceeded to such ungovernable lengths, that the civil power was paralysed, and the military force was obliged to be called in. In one or two cases, blood was shed and lives were lost in these lawless and disgraceful proceedings. There is little, in fact, to look back upon in the election just over that is calculated to confirm the hopes we are so often apt to indulge in, of a steady, gradual, and marked growth of enlightenment and refinement in the national character. The seeds of violence and disorder are too deeply implanted to be eradicated in the course of one generation. With regard to the electors themselves, however, there are signs of improvement. Charges of bribery still continue to be heard ; but, coming from beaten candidates, they are always to be taken with some allowance. The other vice of the electoral system—intimidation—is decidedly on the wane. There are not many charges of that kind made ; and of those that were attempted several were met with such proper spirit by the tenant-farmers, that they are not likely to be repeated. Thus, in the counties of Norfolk and of Northamptonshire, certain great landed proprietors issued their orders to their tenantry to vote for favoured candidates ; and in each such instance the candidate so attempted to be forced on the electors was left at the bottom of the poll. Among the most remarkable incidents of the election was the rejection of Mr. Gladstone from the seat in the University of Oxford which he has held for eighteen years. Many influences combined to produce this result ; but that which gave weight to all the others was the speech he delivered in the course of last session, indicating a wish to separate the Irish from the English branch of the Established Church. Within two days of his defeat, however, he found another seat for South Lancashire ; and we may add that the general result has been a gain of about twenty-five seats for the adherents of the present Government, which, added to the working majority they possessed in the last Parliament, will enable them to carry out any schemes for the national advantage that they may have formed.

A fresh attempt is now being made to connect Europe with America by means of a submarine electric telegraph. Taking advantage of former failures, every precaution that human skill could devise has been adopted to ensure success. It is said that the cable itself is of more perfect construction than the one that was before tried, and that it was laid almost as soon as it was laid ; and that portion of the year was selected for the experiment when, according to all experience, the Atlantic is most free from storms. But the uncertain is the boasted doctrine of averages ! The period chosen as in ordinary times is almost proved to be so boisterously rough, that the small tender having the shoreward end of the cable on board nearly foundered on her passage to the Irish coast ; and the necessary steps were delayed for about twelve days. A start was made, however, on the 23rd, and in ten or twelve days from that time it is hoped the Great Eastern will reach the Newfoundland coast, and the means of communication will be complete. If it be successful, it will, without doubt, be one of the greatest scientific achievements of the century. His mercy grant that no messages but those of peace and goodwill may come through it by the Governments of the Old World or the New!

During the last month two trials for aggravated cases of murder have had two confessions have been made by the criminals. Dr. Pritchard, of Gloucester, was tried and found guilty of the murder, by poisoning, of his wife and his child, and confessed the justice of his sentence. Constance Kent was brought to justice for the murder of her brother solely on the ground of her own confession; to that confession she adhered in trial, and in virtue of her plea of guilty she was sentenced to death. They are singularly alike in one point, and one only—they confess nothing but the truth. As far as the public is aware, they tell nothing of the circumstances under which the crime was done, of the motives by which the criminals were influenced, or the temptations which were lured on to their doom. They confess they were guilty, and that that is all. But in other respects there is a wide distinction to be made. In the case of All through his trial, and for some days after he was sentenced, Dr. Pritchard asserted his innocence; he then attempted to palm off a confession in which his guilt was admitted; and it was not till his spiritual advisers told him to believe his statements that he made a second statement, in which it is believed we have all the truth. The case of Constance Kent is widely different. Her confession was made to the Rev. Mr. Wagner, the well-known Tractarian minister at Brighton, and to the lady superior of the religious house in which she was confined. The condemnation of this novel system of auricular confession in the English Church has been here repeated, nor our opposition to the claim Mr. Wagner set up for himself, that he was not bound, even for the ends of justice, to reveal what his penitents have confessed, but it seems to have been at his instance that the confession thus made was afterwards repeated in public. The sentence, however, will not be carried out. The distance of time since the murder was committed, the prisoner's youth, her sex, and her voluntary confession of guilt—are all so many pleas in mitigation that the Crown should be extended to save her from the worst doom of a felon. Lord Grey has therefore advised Her Majesty to commute her sentence to one of imprisonment for life.

This case of Constance Kent's confession, and the refusal of Mr. Wagner to reveal what she stated to him as her confessor, has stirred up the question how far the practice of auricular confession is allowed by the canons of the Church of England. A case for consideration was submitted to Mr. J. D. Coleridge, the Queen's counsel, and himself deeply imbued with Tractarian opinions. The opinion of this gentleman was in favour of the practice, and mystified, but he evidently leans to the opinion that the practice having been introduced up to the time of the Reformation, was not distinctly prohibited by the Reformers, nor is the obligation laid upon the clergyman to reveal what he has heard in confession thereby taken away. We are not competent to enter into the question; but if the case be as the learned barrister inclines to put it, the more reason the more why the reformers of the English liturgy should bestir themselves to remove the practice.

We are glad to learn that the proposal for an expedition to proceed to Palestine, thoroughly to survey and examine the antiquities of the Holy Land, is to be amply successful. The funds for the purpose are coming in freely from all denominations, it is understood, are about to lend their aid to the accomplishment of a purpose in which all churches are alike interested. Much encouragement was given to the return of the party who went out on a trigonometrical survey, and subsequently extended their labours towards taking the levels of the Holy Land. The commander of that expedition announces that they have brought home interesting information, which will shortly be published. This greatly followed up by one still more cheering—the moderate cost at which the expedition has been done. The commander intimates that his original estimate of the cost was exceeded by a few pounds, and that was caused by the unexpected detention of the expedition while waiting for a favourable opportunity to proceed.

MR. RUSKIN ON SOCIAL DUTY.

FROM the first Mr. Ruskin was almost as much a moralist as a critic, and not a few artists and amateurs have complained that, going to his books to find directions how to draw stones and trees and running brooks, they were beguiled into listening to the sermons which, as Shakespeare tells us, may be extracted from all these. Religious people, on the other hand, caring less than they should do about art, and not sufficiently reflecting that the Divine hand which has filled the valleys with golden treasures for our sustenance has touched the mountain-side with a glory that outvies imperial purple, and vaulted the world with infinite loveliness of blue sky, and chosen for the emblem of His covenant of mercy the fundamental colour-harmony of nature, as the sun strikes it out on the weeping cloud, concluded that, as Mr. Ruskin's declared object was to speak of beauty, he could say nothing worth listening to of goodness or of truth. Had those excellent persons looked into the second volume of the first book Ruskin ever gave to the world, they would have discovered, as the starting-point of all his reasonings, this proposition: "Man's use and function are to be the witness of the glory of God, and to advance that glory by his reasonable obedience and resultant happiness;" while the entire volume to which this formed the introduction was devoted to an exhibition of the mode in which the grand phenomena of nature set forth the glory of the Divine attributes, and the way in which art emulates or ought to emulate the tracings of the Divine finger. In this, also, as in the preceding and all following volumes, no opportunity was lost of enforcing those laws of purity and of righteousness without obedience to which art is but a form of paralyzing luxury; and on many occasions the words or incidents of Scripture were used, or the doctrines of the Gospel alluded to, in terms which proved that the mind of the writer dwelt with habitual reverence and unfeigned love on both. For example, what Christian reader could fail to be edified by the passage in which, starting from that element of repose which all right critics recognise as an essential in great works of art, Mr. Ruskin rises to the contemplation of that rest for which the Lord Jesus called the weary and heavy-laden to Him? "That which in lifeless things ennoble them by seeming to indicate life, ennoble higher creatures by indicating the exaltation of their earthly vitality into a Divine vitality, and raising the life of sense into the life of faith—faith, whether we receive it in the sense of adherence to resolution, obedience to law, regardfulness of promise—in which from all time it has been the test as the shield of the true being and life of man—or in the still higher sense of trustfulness in the presence, kindness, and word of God; in which form it has been exhibited under the Christian dispensation. For whether in one or other form, whether the faithfulness of men, whose path is chosen and portion fixed, in the following and receiving of that path and portion, as in the Thermopylæ camp; or the happier faithfulness of children in the good-giving of their Father, and of subjects in the conduct of their King, as in the 'Stand still and see the salvation of God' of the Red Sea shore—there is rest and peacefulness, the standing still' in both, the quietness of action determined, of spirit unalarmed, of expectation unimpatient; beautiful even when based only as of old, on the self-command and self-possession, the persistent dignity or the uncalculating love, of the creature; but more beautiful yet when the rest is one of humility instead of pride, and the trust no more in the resolution we have taken but in the hand we hold." And to what mind except one habitually conversant with Scriptural themes and sistent even with the state of the unfallen; for the angels who rejoice cannot but feel an uncomprehended pain as they try and try again, they may not warm hard hearts with the brooding of their kind.

It was perhaps, therefore, not surprising, though it unquestionably surprised persons by surprise, that Mr. Ruskin, in his later writings, should more and more sink the critic in the moralist, and finally, declaring that from the first, been with him secondary and subordinate, should hold himself to his contemporaries as a censor morum, an ethical teacher, and a teacher of methods by which life is to be ennobled and well-being to be gained. Wealth but life—life, including all its powers of love, of joy, &c. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of human beings; that man is richest who, having perfected his own life to the utmost, has also the widest helpful influence, both on the means of his possessions, over the lives of others;”—this is the substance of his later writings.

He publishes his views under the name of political economy, extremely severe upon the acknowledged masters in that science, of having based their system upon selfishness, and exclaims that all founded on self-interest is “the fulfilment of that which once bore the policy of angels, and ruin into the economy of Heaven.” For confess that, having read a little in Smith, Ricardo, Macculloch, Mill, political economists, we have understood them never to teach how to be rich at the expense of another, or how one nation is to distance the race of material wealth, but always how individuals and nations to share most of those elements of wealth which the Almighty has allotted. We shall not say of those men that their conception of life and its end is Mr. Ruskin's, but we are certain that every one of them would have felt full indignation from a proposal to point out how a man may accumulate the greatest quantity of gold. That is the political economy of Smith and Ricardo opens the hearts of men and makes them act upon the natural, seemly, and altogether legitimate principle of the largest amount of material good provided for them in this world, and of their abundance to each other. But if Mr. Ruskin's instructi-

and liberality, and practical earnestness, and sterling worth, which exist in the Christian circles of our country. The "imaginary Christianity" of England he denounces with an eloquence of invective which, had he been more guarded in its application, we should not have called too warm. "The dramatic Christianity of the organ and the candle"—we quote from the just published "Lectures at Manchester, in 1864, by Mr. Ruskin"—"of dawn service and twilight revival—the Christianity which we do not care to mix the mockery of, pictorially, with our play about the devil, in our Satanellas, Roberts, Fausts, chanting hymns through traceried windows for back-sound effect, and artistically modelling the 'Dio' through variation on variation of mimicked prayer (while we distribute tracts next day for the benefit of uncultivated swearers, upon what we suppose to be the signification of the Third Commandment)—this gas-lighted and gas-inspired Christianity we are triumphant in, and draw back the hem of our robes from the touch of the heretics who dispute it. But do a piece of common Christian righteousness in a plain English word or deed, to make Christian law any rule of life, and found one national act or hope thereon—we know too well what our faith comes to for that! You might sooner get lightning out of incense-smoke than true action or passion out of your modern English religion. You had better get rid of the smoke, and the organ-pipes, both: leave them and the Gothic windows, and the painted glass, to the property-man; give up your carbonated hydrogen ghost in one healthy expiration, and look after Lazarus at the doorstep. For there is a true Church wherever one hand meets another helpfully, and that is the only holy or Mother Church which ever was, or ever shall be." We shall not say that no man who enjoys and patronises operatic music can be, in the right sense, a Christian; but it is exceedingly incorrect to estimate the extent or quality of the Christian religion of Englishmen by the exhibition made of it by habitual frequenters of such operas as Satanella, Robert, and Faust. Little of righteousness, little of charity, little of any Christian virtue will you find in these. But there are Christians in England—there are tens of thousands of Christians in England—who, while they would start as at a pang of agony at the mimicry of prayer on the stage, and deplore as the very delirium of blasphemy the modern plays about devils and reprobates, perform every day of their lives actions of righteousness, and speak words of beneficent tenderness and of pious wisdom. There are Christians—there are tens of thousands of Christians—in England, of whom it is strictly true, as it was of their Master, that it is their meat and drink to do the will of their Father in Heaven; who watch for opportunities of kindness and beneficence; who sacrifice themselves for the good of others; who are patient in well-doing, and faint not though they reap little in the way of result from their labours; who try method after method to make their charity effectual—who would gratefully thank Mr. Ruskin if he would tell them how the poor are to be helped and the lost to be saved. And of one thing we can assure Mr. Ruskin, that if his cry to England to be a righteous and a merciful nation, to do her people justice, and to feed her poor, is not to be vain and resultless as the wind of Sahara, he must find some way of allying himself with these still surviving Christians in England. The frequenters of operas may cast a hasty glance at what he says, as one of the topics on which a word or two may be spoken in polite society, but not even the eloquence of Ruskin will penetrate the apathy to all spiritual things in which their souls are steeped, and they will fling aside his book with a contemptuous smile, to run after the last sensation novel, or the last operatic delirium about ghosts and devils. Christians were declared by Christ to be the salt of the earth, and if that salt has lost its savour, Mr. Ruskin may give up didactic and hortative writing altogether, for beyond question there is no other part of society that will undertake the work he calls it to.

he says, "mighty of mind—'magnanimous'—to be this is indeed to become this increasingly is indeed to 'advance in life'—in the trappings of it. My friends, do you remember that old Scyth the head of a house died? How he was dressed in his finest dress chariot, and carried about to his friends' houses; and each of them at his table's head, and all feasted in his presence? Suppose it were in plain words, as it is offered to you in dire facts, that you should gradually lose honour, gradually, while you yet thought yourself alive. Suppose this: you shall die slowly; your blood shall daily grow cold, your heart beat at last only as a rusted group of iron valves; your life you, and sink through the earth into the ice of Caina; but day after day you shall be dressed more gaily, and set in higher chariots, and have more breast—crowns on its head, if you will. Men shall bow low before it, shout round it, crowd after it up and down the streets, build palaces with it at their tables' heads all the night long; your soul shall stand by it to know what they do, and feel the weight of the golden dress and the furrow of the crown-edge on the skull—no more. Would you offer, verbally made by the death-angel? Would the meanest among them think you? Yet practically and verily we grasp at it, every one of us. Many of us grasp at it in its fulness of horror. Every man accepts to advance in life without knowing what life is; who means only to get more horses, and more footmen, and more fortune, and more public notice, not more personal soul. He only is advancing in life whose heart is warmer, whose blood warmer, whose brain quicker, whose spirit is entering. And the men who have this life in them are the true lords or kings, they, and they only."

We believe that writing like this is fitted to do much practical good. Young men, attracted to it by Mr. Ruskin's eloquence, will be more interested in ideas than those of material advancement, and will be encouraged to listen to those voices of worldly ambition, above all to the voice of the syren, wealth, which are transcendently powerful in these days. It succeeded by his works on art in rousing artists to a more honest and true love of nature, and in teaching the public to appreciate art more justly.

THE GOSPEL OF THE INFANCY.

ONE of the most valuable treasures in our National Gallery is the "Holy Family" of Murillo, and amidst the ten thousand pictures which have striven to realize the dreams of fancy on the domestic interiors of Bethlehem and Nazareth, this "great vision" of sacred beauty rightly occupies nearly the most honourable place. Here stands aloft the infant Jesus, between Joseph and Mary, his face beaming with ineffable sweetness and dignity, such as He may have appeared when the Wise Men from the distant East "came to worship him." Lingered awhile as before this "pleasant picture," in which Art has truly served Religion, let us recount the ever-living story, with some of its lessons so applicable to our own necessities.

The reign of Herod had almost ended. The aged tyrant (Nero and Caligula compounded into one person) sat upon the throne of Judah, a sort of visible viceroy of the Evil Power, casting the black shadow of his soul over the whole region which groaned beneath his sway. Suddenly Jerusalem is agitated by the arrival of a company of venerable strangers—Magians—from the sun-rising, who announce that, having seen, nearly two years ago, the star of the long-expected King of the Jews hovering in the western sky, they had come from the ends of the earth to offer homage at his feet. Alarmed at the sound of his rival's name, and dreading the extinction of his dynasty, the instant thought of the hoary tyrant on Mount Zion was to assist the Magians in discovering the birthplace and present residence of the Son of God, so that under colour of presenting his adoration along with theirs he might procure his murder. With this view, he immediately assembled the chief priests and scribes of the Holy City, probably in his own palace, and demanded of them, WHERE THE MESSIAH SHOULD BE BORN? We see the aged King, his face crimsoned with the blood of years, that was already on his conscience, awaiting their answer with anxious, wicked eye, as he sat, surrounded by his guards, under his canopy of state. Some of the wise men of our own time would have answered him that "all prophecy is unintelligible till after the event." But they replied, and rightly, "In Bethlehem of Judah; for thus it is written by the prophet, 'Thou, Bethlehem Ephrathah, art not the least among the thousands of Judah, for out of thee shall come a Governor, who shall rule my people Israel.'" Places are truly great according to the quality of the men that inhabit them, or who have been born there. A great man's residence or memory is the truest glory of any neighbourhood. Territorial magnitude sinks down as a claim to distinction before illustrious characters or events. Bethlehem was "great in the sight of the Lord," because out of it should come the Ruler of the House of Israel, and of the Gentiles also. Thus also is this "little world" great before God. It is but a village in the creation, but it is the Bethlehem of the universe, the birthplace of the King of Glory, "God manifest in the flesh." The greatest events do not always occur in the largest worlds.

Furnished with this clue to the centre of the labyrinth in which Providence was hiding its purposes, Herod next secretly called the Wise Men, and inquired of them accurately what time the star appeared. Finding that it was two years ago, he dismissed them to Bethlehem, in order that they might ascertain the hiding-place of the King Messiah; commanding them, if they were successful, immediately to return to Jerusalem and inform him of their discovery, when he too would "go and worship him." Thus bad men for their own ends endeavour to penetrate the secrecy of God, who nevertheless hides the true light within impenetrable clouds, wraps it in "darkness as a swaddling-band," and suffers it to shine through only where He pleases.

When they heard the King, they departed, and, lo, the star which they saw when in the east went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. The broken thread of Divine communication is always restored for the friends of truth. Here was first the star seen in the East, which had led them to Palestine and then disappeared; secondly, at Jerusalem the prophecy respecting Bethlehem which had been rightly interpreted; and now at last the star appeared again as the travellers travelled in the dark to the "place where the young child was." Thus God never abandons his servants to hopeless entanglements. Guiding stars are given the Heaven's elect shall never miss their way or lose their labour, and clearest lights in the darkest nights to those who take the longest journeys, in the search for love divine. A man's literal "walk" determines his character at least as much as his "conversation." "Ye came unto Me." Other objects beside business and amusement may well move men to distant journeyings; to visit the seats of ancient wisdom or the places consecrated by the actions of departed saints and heroes; much more to form an acquaintance with living wisdom and living greatness. The Queen of Sheba shall "rise up in the judgment" to condemn those for whom every walk is far too long which leads them only to worship or instruction, and no journey too remote which promises an idle pastime at the end.

The sacred "place" in Bethlehem was no longer the stable, where Jesus was born. Joseph had doubtless settled in the town, under the impression that it was to be his permanent abode. It was some cottage-temple on the white and shaded slope of Bethlehem, where the Magians worshipped the Infant King—an ordinary peasant's home. We now see them entering—after solemn and reverent salutation at the door—not a little, perhaps, to the surprise of the inmates. The cottage, bearing probably traces of the skill and craft of its master, "the carpenter," is pervaded by an air of order and sanctity. The working-man who lives here is no richly-paupered drunken "operative," with a "mouth set against the heavens," and a character vile than that of the beasts that perish; but, as we see in Murillo's picture, beneath the mechanic's coat there dwells a princely soul. He is "a just man," and the lineal descendant of kings and righteous men. Here, too, is Mary, his young wife—like her husband, not destitute of the indelible traces of high descent in mien and aspect and lighted as to the face with a suffusion of divine dreams and mystery, yet with a peasant in her apparel and surroundings. They at once relate the purport of the visit. Where is the Son of David? Where the Holy Child, to worship whom they have crossed the breadth of the world? Jesus was now two years old, not yet the "man of sorrows" or "acquainted with grief." Summoned by his mother, he stands there as the great painter has portrayed him, between Joseph and Mary, on a stone beside the door, and receives, much wondering, the prostrate homage and gifts of the eastern sages. Here is the curly hair, the broken speech of infancy, as everywhere but the eye, the forehead, and the heavenly expression of the sunlit sinless countenance are peculiar to Him. Were they not "wise men" who had sought out and discerned the beauty of "the Rose of Sharon," even when folded and concealed in the bud of infancy; and "wise men" who poured out the homage of devout and learned souls at the feet of that Eternal Lord, before whom, so soon, innumerable millions will cast their crowns upon the sapphire pavement, while heaven itself resounds with the cry of "Worthy is the Lamb?" And who can doubt that Mary, who "laid up in her heart" and "pondered" the sayings of the temple-saints, and the report of the shepherds of Bethlehem concerning the descent of Heaven's inhabitants in splendour and in songs on the night of his birth, would lay up also in her most sacred cabinet the "gold and frankincense and myrrh," the first-fruits of the wealthy Orient, rendered to her Lord while as yet Israel knew him not?

What high communication they held with the blissful Mother over the Holy Child we know not. Doubtless, in simplest words, they would express their sense of her high honour and blessedness as the Mother of the Great Predicted King.

whom Asia and the Isles should one day all obey. And surely we cannot say that such expressions were unfitted to be uttered by them, or received by her. With what wonder must they have looked upon her! With how much more of holy awe, in her more conscious hours, must she have thought upon herself. To this young Jewish maiden not long ago the chief Angel Gabriel, clothed in heavenly glory, had appeared at Nazareth, with the salutation on his tongue of fire—"Hail, highly favoured, blessed art thou among women!" And, though clothed herself with humility and maidenly reserve, from her own lips had burst in inspired song that loud exulting Magnificat, which has since re-echoed for ages beneath so many a sacred dome: "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour; for He hath regarded the low estate of His handmaiden, for behold from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed."

With this celestial sanction, can we wonder if succeeding ages have looked back upon her memory with a feeling of delighted congratulation? Nor can we pronounce such feeling to be wholly sinful or idolatrous. With the growth of the Church's understanding of the majesty of Christ has grown the understanding of Mary's "blessedness." But who that had stood among the Magians in the cottage at Bethlehem—gazing with them upon her humble countenance, irradiated by so divine a gleam of awe and thankfulness—could have imagined her future history, or guessed that the perverse theology of all future generations would find in her the subject of its chief delusions? Pass on in thought a thousand years, and read with wonder the story of this peasant wife and mother. To all Christendom she has become "the Queen of Heaven." She is conceived of by all its millions as sitting beside the throne of the ETERNAL DEITY, and exerting the chief influence on His counsels. All Europe and its scattered colonies worship her, as in fact the chief availing Mediator between God and man. Our English calendar still flashes with the brightness of her name in our "Lady's Day." From the Atlantic shores to the extreme limits of Christendom, cathedrals and parish churches without number become the seats of her adoration, while lamps, more numerous than the stars of heaven, have burned through centuries before her shrines. To beseech her patronage and intercession, ten thousand choirs send up their interwoven harmonies. Before her statues and pictures, in which the art of every land has breathed forth its finest inspirations, the living multitudes bend in silent worship. To her flies the Pope of this very day as to his "Queen," his "loving Mother," his "Rock," and his "Refuge." To her the cardinals before Rome's highest altars direct their importunate prayers. To her myriads of learned priests, and shaven monks, and cloistered sisterhoods address to-day their morning and their evening song. In her honour this very night the peasants on the lakes of Switzerland, and the veiled nuns at either extremity of the world, from China to Rome, will alike chant their Ave Santissima, and repeat to-morrow their solemn lay; and, finally, to exalt her to the highest pinnacle of greatness, at length, within the last ten years, a Roman council of bishops assembled from the whole earth, pronounces that she was "born without stain"—one spotless lily blooming in the midst of a world of sinners. It would have been strange if the Magi had foreseen all these things while looking upon her and the Holy Child at Bethlehem.

Whence all this world of worship offered to "Mary the mother of Jesus?" Surely the nearly universal outpouring of such a tide of passion bespeaks some natural sentiment. How was it—since neither prophets nor evangelists indicated so great an exaltation—that Mary became the chief mediator of Greek and Roman Christendom, and almost its Goddess? The answer is not difficult to find. It sprang from a profound want, which Christianity itself awakened in the world—a yearning after tenderness on high. Man's heart, breaking under the burden of his outward sufferings, and still more deeply agitated within by a guilty conscience, and by dread of the "judgment to come," longs to find repose in some heavenly power that "can be touched with a feeling of its infirmities." When the essential spirit of paganism had corrupted Christianity, the spirit which disintegrates the true and embracing idea of ONE GOD, HOLY AND MERCIFUL, and had fixed in the mind of Europe the conception of a God too "holy" to be kind and compassionate, then the necessities of man's condition generated the thought of a separate Power of Men to balance and limit the action of the Avenging Deity. When the true character of God in Christ was forgotten, through the neglect of the Scriptures, the "God of all grace," it was inevitable that some heathenish substitute should be found, some pagan representation of the attribute of tenderness, now separated from the complex unity of God. And what thought more natural, when once the doctrine of mediation was cast aside, than that recourse should be had to her whose salvation was so certain, whose honour was so distinguished, and whose relation to the "terrible Judge" was so near—to that mild and affectionate Mary, whose motherhood could be depended on both for influence in the heavens and compassion upon earth. "She, to whom nothing will be refused, will prevail upon her Son, who will then prevail upon His Father, to grant mercy to sinners upon earth. And this is the very essence of paganism—to segregate the Divine attributes, and worship them under isolated symbols. The remedy for it is the true Protestant Apostolic doctrine of Mediation and Atonement; that the same God who is just is also merciful, and that "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Romanists often say to Protestants, "You have a Father, but you have no Mother." The answer is—"Ye worship ye know not what," for the Lord himself hath spoken: "AS ONE WHOM HIS MOTHER COMFORTETH, SO WILL I COMFORT YOU." (Is. lxvi. 13.)

But turn again, in parting from this picture, to contemplate the Holy Child once more. We possess four narratives of the Passion, but only a few descriptive touches of the Infancy. He grew in wisdom and in stature, and in favour with God and man—a trifling statement to make respecting anyone else, but noteworthy in relation to Him in whom "dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." In the bosom of holies dwelt the EVERLASTING LIGHT; but it beamed with a restrained radiance through the vail which separated it from the human mind that received its reflection beyond. Only gradually was the Wonderful One revealed even to Himself, as the innocence and weakness of childhood dwelt unchanged beneath the overshadowing of the Infinite. Unchanged so far as this, that the finite intellect did not cease to be childlike; but not uninfluenced by the Divine companionship, since the "image of God" shone forth from a face like the blue heavens without a cloud. Noble as is Murillo's endeavour, we may well believe that art has failed as yet to depict worthily the childlike countenance that expressed the sweetness and majesty of Eternal Love. We may well believe that a divine, unusual calm surrounded the Holy Child, growing up in blissful silence, and afterwards that a constant, affectionate obedience, an industrious compliancy with the will of his much-pondering Mother, and freedom from all sinful passion and boyish vulgarity of tone, attested the presence of the heavenly Beauty blooming in the shade.

Yes, the mind labours to picture to itself the scenes that must have been present in the Carpenter's workshop of Nazareth, which had become the most sacred temple in the world! To think how the first efforts of Joseph and Mary to convey to the opening mind knowledge of the things of God were met with wondrous readiness!

velation from within ; how his understanding in religion seemed a growth from ard life, much rather than an instruction from external agency ; how the prattle the playfulness of early childhood were free from the common vanity ; if, indeed, holy childhood bore not rather in a natural exceeding pensiveness the prophetic as of his destiny ; so that a melancholy seclusion of spirit, not less than an innate imity of thought, separated from other children the " rejected of men ;" how his r prayers were not the form of an infantile liturgy repeated night and morning oy or weariness, without thought or care, but from the earliest use of speech and n of reason the passionate divine breathings of a heaven-born soul, turning by a ral instinct its eagle eye upon the Sun of Spirits—a soul without the sense of that feasted itself upon the Divine Brightness as upon its proper intellectual ent—a soul not once disturbed by anger or moroseness, by crafty dealings, or spasms of obstinate self-will—a spirit that moved evenly in its orbit, like a iant planet unclouded by the mists of evil, and poised for ever upon " the poles truth." See him in Joseph's workshop, as he grew old enough to lend a hand of p to that " just man," now holding the tools required in succession, now trying an steady hand with the hammer or the saw ; while ever and again Joseph was struck mb, or brought to a halt in his industry, by a sudden glance at that marvellous ntenance, like a window into heaven, or by some soul-searching, truth-piercing estion from his lips. See him again, on clear Sabbath mornings, in the village-y's best attire, clean and holy, the " spotless lamb," hasting, in Mary's hand, in d time to the synagogue on the hill-side " where he was brought up," there dis-guished amidst the crowds of formal or noisy worshippers by his devout attention, the zeal of his adoration, and by his voice, as the Chorister of God, in psalmody lifted with the warmth and vigour of an angel's hymn. See him too, sometimes, en a little older, on summer evenings, ascending the heights alone to gaze abroad er the vast panorama of Northern Palestine, while the Mediterranean lay west-rd like a " sea of glass mingled with fire," flashing under the beams of the scending sun, and Hermon in the east flung back the radiance from his snow-owned summits—there gazing until the short twilight had darkened into the aming, and the firmament was alight with the constellations ; when He, the Son the Blessed, would prostrate himself before the King of Eternity, and pour out a ardour of his youthful spirit in an ecstasy of delighted worship, or in the lonely, r-resounding voice of a psalm. Was there ever such an altar, or ever a worshipper so re ?—And lastly, we see him among the doctors in the temple—his mind under e operation of the law by which the human soul is appointed to learn by " asking estions." Each generation of children is born with a divinely-inspired instinct so do ; but one of the chief objects of corrupted education is to destroy this spirit of uthful inquiry. It was not to be extinguished in him ; and doubtless many a earer of that famous colloquy felt that a power of simple truth and fervent love to od was before them, before which the rabbinical puzzles of many generations would e driven as chaff before the wind.

The infancy and childhood of JESUS have thrown a glorious ray of hope over e whole world of the young. The King of Glory was once a babe, a child ; and can is fact signify less than that He is the Redeemer of children ? He has carried with lim to heaven the charter of their eternal salvation, in the recollections of His own nfancy, and in the scars of His death for the whole world. Not only on earth will le " take young children in his arms and bless them." Not only on earth, will He set a little child in the midst of his disciples ;"—but doubtless the Good Shepherd a high cares for His " lambs " as well as for His " sheep," and " carries them in His oom." FEED MY LAMBS were among his last words on earth ; and we will not doubt that the Son of David, standing in the Temple of Heaven itself, delights ears there, as He did below, with the Hosannahs of the little ones.

For the childhood of Jesus is everlasting. He continues to be a little child amidst all the strength and majesty of His manhood enthroned in the skies. Simplicity of character is the element of the highest greatness. It is to God's "Holy Child Jesus" that the weary and heavy laden may come; and it is because He is "meek and lowly in heart," that they shall "find rest unto their souls." Infinite Wisdom childlike in the simplicity of its character, and Infinite Love is childlike in the warmth of its affection.

And so we take our leave of the priceless Murillo; and, as Wordsworth says:—

What mine eyes behold, see thou,
Even though the Atlantic Ocean roll between.

THE DAY OF REST: A SERMON IN LONDON.

THIS is the day which the Lord hath made. He made it in Paradise; the exile Eden were allowed to carry it with them when they went forth on their long, desolate pilgrimage; to the Holy Land and to the peculiar people a new and special version was given; and with all its blessedness, and with a new reason for observance, it has been transferred into the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

This is the day which the Lord hath made. He made it as a memorial of man's creation, and it carries us back to that time of innocence and communion with God when no sin had blighted the scene, and when no cloud had come between and his Maker. He made it as a memorial of the great Redemption, and every time that it returns it tells, "The Lord is risen. Jesus hath entered into His rest, for the people of God that rest of His remaineth." A memento of the Paradise it is a prophecy of the Paradise to come.

Of such a day the very essence is rest—a rest holy and rejoicing. It comes to interrupt our toils; it takes from our galled hands the implements of industry; it closes the haunts of traffic; it lulls the tumult in the street; it brings the child home from school; it re-unites the family; it stops the area bell and the postman's knock, and converts the little dwelling into a household sanctuary; in the day completed round the table it gives rare opportunity for affectionate converse; in the quiet morning or evening hour, with the door shut to—what a rare opportunity for reading, meditation, and prayer—what an opportunity to commune with our hearts and lay in strength for fresh toils and duties!

It is a boon needed by all nations, but in this "Old World" needed by none so much as Britain, and nowhere in Britain so much as London. Here all the demands are for high-pressure engines, and these are usually worked top-speed; and whether you attend to business or follow a profession—whether you write articles for a newspaper or manufacture goods for a contractor, everything is done ex-tempore and express, and so with a prodigious expenditure of vital power. And it is all in vain that friends entreat, Take time. Take time to improve your mind. Take time to enjoy your family. The true Mammonite—the hapless man who has got sucked into this central vortex—gets time for nothing. He has no time to look at the beautiful world; no time to read the Bible; no time to go to church; no time to save his soul; no time to prepare for eternity.

But the wise Christian takes time, for his Heavenly Father insists on it. He insists on your taking the Sabbath. So take it, and take the whole of it. In the days "labour and do all your work," so that no unfinished task may intrude into it.

consecrated hours, nor haunt you with that worst preparation for a restful Sabbath—the consciousness of neglected duty, the remembrance of an idle or wasted week. And when it comes, husband it for yourself and for those around you. A cheerless meal, a tawdry toilet, a fireless chamber, is no right reception for such a guest; and with a view to do it honour and get the full good of it we must set our houses and ourselves in order. Surely that labour is legitimate which makes the Sabbath more abbatial; but with a little forethought on the previous evening, such labour, such lighting of the Sabbath lamp, need not infringe materially on your own leisure, or the leisure of your servants.

When the Sabbath comes, surrender to its influences. Surrender to its sanctity, say to yourself:—

Another six days' work is done,
Another Sabbath is begun;
Return, my soul; enjoy thy rest;
Improve the day thy God hath blessed.

Oh that my thoughts and thanks may rise
As grateful incense to the skies;
And draw from heaven that sweet repose
Which none but he that feels it knows.

And as you have now time for ample and deliberate devotion, take time to pray. Take time to get into the spirit of prayer. Think over the mercies of the by-gone week; think over its opportunities and advantages; think over its shortcomings and its sins. Think over your own wants and necessities; think of the work before you, and think of the help which you are likeliest to need. Think of your high calling. Remember that you are following Christ, and that you hope to join the society which is gathering around Him in Heaven. And as your thoughts mount upward your horizon expands. You look in on the sick-room and pray for your suffering neighbour. You look in on the other dwellings like your own, from which the same morning incense is beginning to wreath upward, and you pray for fellow-worshippers and fellow-Christians. You look out on the distant dwellings, some eastward and already bright beneath the noonday beam, some westward and still dim in night's shadow; and, as you commend them to God, you rejoice to think that the dear and the absent have the same Almighty Guardian beside them who has watched your own slumber, and who now makes glad your own waking. And before you come home, perhaps, you espy a light in a garret, a lamp in some study-window, and, as you see the dark figure bending over the concordance and Bible, you think of the hundreds of missionaries, the thousands of preachers, the hundreds of thousands of Sabbath-school teachers, who are this day furbishing their armour; and you pray that the arrows may be sharp, that the success may be signal, and that many happy captives may be brought into the camp of Immanuel—into the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The Sabbath comes; surrender to its leisure. Take time to rest. In Exodus we read that "the taskmasters hasted the Israelites." Up early, down late, long hours, short meals, everything was made anxious and irksome by the demands of an inexorable urgency. And most of us have taskmasters; and perhaps those who have the least leisure are the people who look the most autocratic, the people who call no man master, and who only give orders to others. But there they are, of all slaves the most hotly pressed, and the hardest driven. Their taskmaster is business, ambition, fashion, the care of a family; and see how it "hastes" them. As you meet them in Cheapside, see how seared and hunted is their look, how nervously they snatch their morsel of food; how instantly, as if they again heard the baying of the hounds, they start to their legs, and, expressed down to the country, like Samson's foxes with fagots flaming behind them, see how they set the very fields on fire, and make the place hot wherever they come. But behold an asylum. Whosoever runs into the Sabbath is safe. He is safe from fantastic alarms and real importuni-ties; and a wise man will take the full advantage. You take it. Rest and be thankful. Don't strain your mind. Even books of sound theology, if the thought need be severe, reserve for other days, and instead of hacking and hewing in the tanjungle of controversy, keep within the clearings; frequent the still waters and pastures green, the Bible, Christian biography, and those books which edify with demanding too much exertion. And let this be a day of pleasant converse. Some people seem to gather a family around them as other people collect a library. They intend some day to commune with those mighty thinkers and grow wise; but meanwhile the mighty thinkers stand in neglected pomp till their brilliant coats get faded. And you have built yourself a house; God has planted a family around you; when are they to have the benefit, or you yourself the blessing? When are you going to break the silence? When do you purpose to form the acquaintance of children? When do you mean to take off the bushel, and let your light shine so that in the house may see it? When do you mean to take the pressure from off that clogged brain of yours, the rack from off that strained and tortured faculty, and unloose in the bosom of your family? This is the day to do it. This is the day for friendly cheerful, hallowed intercourse. This is the day when brothers and sisters may gather into a true companionship. This is the day when parents may drop the loving word or holy lesson which shall be found again after fifty years. This is the day when those who have lived together the longest may strike open new fountains of thought and affection, and start topics which, if they cannot be exhausted on earth, may be resumed in Heaven. This is the day when, betwixt bodily repose and spiritual renovation, what with the cessation of wonted pursuits, and the play of kind affections, what with taking the good that God sends you and trying to do some good to others—you may renew your strength; and, with fibres fresh strung, with tempers no longer throbbing, with new hopes and new powers, may to the morrow mount like an eagle.

Although the Jews do not keep the Christian Sabbath, many of them keep their own seventh day most strictly, and those of them who have Gentile servants usually give them every facility for observing Sunday. Shall I tell the children here a tale which the Jews of Frankfort tell their children? Joseph Moschabbe not only forbore from all work on the Sabbath-day, but consecrated the best to it as to some honoured visitant. If successful in business through the week, he said, "Here is something to bestow on the guest whom the good God sends me;" and when Friday arrived he hastened to the market and bought a fish: then, lighting the Sabbath lamp and singing a joyful psalm, he and his household feasted together. But his wealthy neighbour often taunted him, saying, "A fine way to lay up for old age is this Sabbath-keeping." And this rich man who had no other pleasure than in scraping together and hoarding—this miser, kept no Sabbath. One day, however, an astrologer said to him, "You need not be niggardly. In the stars it stands written, and all your wealth shall go to Joseph the Sabbath-honourer." "What!" thought the miser, "shall all my savings go to a man who saves nothing, and whose money is constantly passing from hand to hand and rather than such a result he resolved to get out of the way. All his cash was converted into pearls, and, stringing them together, he tied them round his waist and took his passage, and went to sea. But one day on shipboard his hat was blown off, and as it whirled overboard and vanished among the waves the horrified miser could hardly refrain from leaping after it into the seething abyss. Soon after, a noble fish was brought to market. Everybody admired it, but it was so dear that he said, "Joseph only can buy that fish." It was Friday, and Joseph soon came running into the market. The fish was very dear, but it was worth the money, and the ce that was asked Joseph paid without haggling. And a good bargain it was, there on opening the fish was the string of pearls, a splendid endowment for Joseph's old age.*

Into this story the Jews have thrown the result of their own experience—that sacrifice for the sake of the Sabbath will come back into your own bosom; and any a Christian can confirm the testimony. For the moment you may need to give some advantage; but the immediate gain which you forfeit, and which has passed to the hand of the unscrupulous worldling, if to the eye of sense it has gone into depths of the sea, will come back to yourself in pearls of great price. For, far more precious than any gem ever fetched from the depths of the ocean, are peace of science, serenity of spirit, the social affections, mental repose, bodily renovation, all those numberless blessings which attend a Sabbath duly honoured. "If thou turn away thy foot from it, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable: and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride on the high places of the earth, and will feed thee with the heritage of Jacob my chosen; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

At the same time, it is interesting to observe how this boon of the all-bountiful Creator is beginning to be appreciated by many who are not prepared to devote the day to its highest purposes. To instance in one class only: Ten years ago there were 2,745 cabs in London, of which 570 took a six-days' licence. Last year, these vehicles had doubled that number, and out of the 5,665 there were 1,865 which took six-days' licence: in other words, between the years 1854 and 1864 the proportion of those claiming the Sunday rest had risen from a fifth to a third of the whole. And even although the 2,000 drivers thus set free may not all of them spend the day religiously, in the interests of humanity and social progress who can help rejoicing at the concession of their rightful release from labour? When the contest as lately raging in California which has terminated in the public protection of the Lord's-day, a distinguished actress in San Francisco refused to play on Sunday nights, saying in her card: "I would rather be, as I am, deprived of my engagement—which was averaging 771 dollars a night—than to act in violation of law, and my own conviction of right."

The Sabbath comes: comply with its invitation. Christ has entered into His rest, and is now supremely happy, and, in the spirit of all holy happiness, He desires to make you a sharer in His own. Having finished Redemption and having left in His grave the load of man's transgression, He now rests from His labour, and to you who still labour and are heavy laden He says, "Come to Me, and I will give you rest." Still burdened with besetting sin and the bondage of corruption—heavy laden as you are with a sense of unspeakable unworthiness, from out of the deep, calm Sabbath of His finished work the Lord Jesus invites you into forgiveness and the fulness of all joy: Himself most blessed forevermore—overflowing with infinite compassion and with the sweet solace of His own accepted sacrifice, He invites you into that love of God which, beaming so brightly on Himself, takes in all who come to God through Him. So come. Trustfully and thankfully come to the Lord Jesus; or, perhaps I should rather say, from the Christ who comes to you run not you away. From the Gospel which comes to you do not let your thoughts retreat with a secret subtle shrinking—as if the tidings were too good or the time too soon. Do not say to the Saviour, "Not yet. I am not ready yet. I wish to be more serious first. I wish my spirit softer. I wish a longer interval between myself and my worldliness. I wish to lessen my amount of sin." No, harden not your heart by such absurd attempts to soften it, but to-day, if you will hear His voice, be persuaded of God's pardoning mercy, and surrender to that grace which now appears unto all men, bringing salvation. From that lover of lost souls who comes seeking you run not you away. If you feel as if you had not strength to follow Him, beg that He would carry you, and, Good Shepherd that He is, weak, wounded, and paralyzed as you are, He will bear the lost sheep on His shoulders rejoicing. The bells have their minstrelsy; the musical chime has its meaning. But the Lord's-day—in its hushed and holy silence the angel anthem comes again; and peace, good will, glory to God, are still sung from the open firmament. It is not only the memorial of the past, although we have its faithful record, and—

Your eyes by faith the Lord behold,
How, on the week's first day of old,

From death He rose, on earth He trod,
Was seen of men, and went to God;

but you have its present Gospel besides :—

And as we fondly pause to look
When in some daily handled book
Approval's well-known tokens stand,
Traced by some dear and thoughtful hand,

Even so there shines one day in seven Bright with the special marks of heaven,
That we with love and praise may dwell
On Him who loved our souls so well.

It is this which signalises the Christian Sabbath—that on this day so many a son, so many a daughter of Abraham has been loosed from his bond, and so many a withered arm has been stretched forth and endued with power from on high. It is this which makes it so memorable in the annals of the Church of the Saved; and it is this which may make it a day much to be remembered by you. To its proclamation of free grace answer with your cordial compliance; and from the open well, the public fountain, with joy draw salvation. To the silver trumpet which sounds from the Temple into which the King of Glory has entered, and which proclaims to a captive jubilee, answer by quitting Satan's thralldom, and returning as a ransomed sinner home to God. To the true Sabbatic minstrelsy, to that voice of free grace which speaks to you from Heaven, and which bids you bear no burden on the Sabbath day, answer by laying your sins on Jesus, the spotless Lamb of God; to that strain which, from the battlements of glory, repeats the name of Jesus, let your heart be the echo; and as it tells how, all His work of atonement completed, Jesus resting, if you believe it you too will enter into rest. Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound. Happier than they who only obey the church-going bell will be you who in the name of Jesus rejoice exceedingly, and in the brightness of God's face move forward to the heaven-going sound of the Gospel.

The Lord's-day comes: seek to be "in the Spirit." Pray for the Comforter. Last week in the world you had tribulation: you had sorrow, molestation, anxiety, ill-usage. In the world you had tribulation; this day seek the society of Jesus, and you shall have peace. Listen to that voice which greeted the first waking of Job in Patmos, "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last;" and as you meditate on Christ's glory, on His mysterious friendship for sinners, and His changeless love, your spirit will be soothed and strengthened; and as you yourself are drawn upward the vexations of everyday existence will dwindle; and even for the graver sorrows and solicitudes you will get that inward serenity, and that hope in God, which is the best preparation. This is one great use of social worship. Whatever the words spoken may be, on the wings of consenting prayer and praise our spirits rise; as we are able to overlook—to see over—some of our lesser trials by climbing a little up the Hill of God; and the sufferings of the present time we can face more courageously after enjoying a glimpse of the glory hereafter to be revealed. And as we are caught up where stately worshippers are exclaiming, "Blessing and honour and glory as power be unto Him that sitteth upon the Throne, and unto the Lamb for ever," glorification and gratitude may lift us out of our habitual selfishness, with all its murmuring and moping; and if enabled to subjoin, "To Him that washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory and dominion for ever," we may return to life and its labours, if not with a countenance no more sad, at least with a spirit less sour, touched by a sense of infinite obligation, and by the thought of Him who loved us so divinely charmed into that love congenial which beareth all things, hopeth all things.

THE RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL FETE OF THE 15TH OF AUGUST.

Do your readers know what the fête of August 15 is in this country? No, perhaps. When I will give them some details on this subject; for there is herein a singular and curious amalgamation of very different things.

The solemnity of August 15 is in the first place consecrated to what is called the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. The Romish Church pretends that Mary was raised again well as Jesus Christ, and that she was body and soul transported into heaven. This is an invention which dates from the eighth or fifth century of the Christian era. The theologians of Romanism who are a little enlightened and scrupulous, maintain, as true, through a feeling of shame, that the bodily ascension of the Virgin has never been determined to be an article of faith, agreed by the councils or the fathers; but the Jesuits and the priests take great care to indoctrinate the people with the more superstitious opinion.

Such is the religious aspect of the fête of August 15, and it has become yet more solemn and pompous since Louis XIII., a pious and bigoted prince, in 1638 placed the kingdom of France under the special protection of Mary. This vow of Louis XIII., as historians speak, has been upheld by the Romish clergy, notwithstanding the progress of public opinion, and the changes introduced by revolutions.

But an altogether different element has been introduced into this solemnity since the commencement of the present century. Napoleon I. was desirous that the anniversary of his baptismal name should be celebrated by the French people. But what day was to be chosen for that ceremony? There was not a St. Napoleon in the calendar. The conqueror of Austerlitz and of Marengo therefore conceived the idea of taking the 15th of August for his own fête! Thus he divided with the Virgin Mary the homage and the rejoicing of the public.*

An intrusion of this kind was very audacious, and rather sacrilegious in the eyes of the Romish clergy. But what of that? Napoleon was then at the height of his power and glory; he governed at Rome as well as in Paris! The aged Pontiff Pius VII. dared not make any objection, and the French prelates humbly bowed their heads before the Imperial dictatorship. It was therefore agreed that the same day should be consecrated to the Virgin Mary and to Napoleon I. This amalgamation has been re-established by his successor Napoleon III., who regards it as the first of his duties to imitate, as much as possible, all that was done by the founder of his dynasty.

Here, then, is a double fête, religious and political, Popish and national. The reports of cannon are mingled with the sound of bells; military reviews are associated with religious processions. Civil functionaries and priests, officers and monks, all have their part to fill on the 15th of August, and the people pass by turns from the solemnities of the Church to the worldly exhibitions of theatres and fireworks. This is ridiculous enough; but popular customs are often very strange, and it is probable that the Virgin Mary and St. Napoleon will continue to be associated, famous formula enunciated by Count Cavour, —a free Church in a free State. But in spite of this lofty and disdainful opposition the utopia makes progress in the national mind. Already all the liberal journals, and even the most moderate, energetically develop this thesis, that the quarrels renewed without ceasing by the sacerdotal power with the civil authority cannot be appeased except by a complete separation, or a reciprocal independence. Very well! This serious question has recently occupied one of the sittings of the Legislative Chamber. M. Jules Favre, one of the most eminent orators of our parliamentary assemblies, when discussing the part of the budget devoted to the salary of the priests, distinctly called for the legal separation of the two powers. He showed that the Romish Church and the State divide the mass of French society into two hostile parties, and that this profound disagreement must sooner or later produce terrible catastrophes. "The only method of pacifically resolving the problem," said the illustrious speaker, "is liberty. . . . I am convinced that the [Romish] Church fails to understand its true interest in refusing this separation, for it might draw from liberty a new life; it would bring together the popular classes, would obtain their respect, and the renewal of faith would recompense them for momentary sacrifices." The speaker for the Government naturally expressed an opinion precisely opposite. He said that the missions of the Church and State are alike, that the two powers are charged to maintain order in requested the Government to take energetic measures against the progress of immorality in France. The author of this request drew a shocking picture of the vice which prevails in families and in society at large, and begged that the legislature would be more severe against persons of both sexes who could set a mischievous example of scandalous excess.

Assuredly the intention of the petitioner was good, and the Senate discussed his memorial with laudable solicitude. M. Dupin, an aged man of more than eighty years, Procureur-General in our highest court of justice, delivered upon this subject a very remarkable speech, in which, after having severely blamed the growing luxury in female dress, he proposed to the mothers of families to form associations to check expense in clothing, after the example of temperance societies. There would then be for women societies for promoting simplicity and modesty! This is all very good, and very fine in a senatorial harangue; but what will be the practical results? Will the severities of the law and the police render our population more modest and more moral? It is not likely. The remedy, and the only effectual one, must be sought in the revival of religious faith. When souls are turned towards holy things and the treasures of heaven, everything assumes a new aspect, and bad habits are attacked at their roots. Unfortunately, Christian convictions become more and more weakened in France. Here is the main source of the evil, and all the speeches of senators will do nothing with it. Besides, it must be owned, the shameful spectacle of domestic vice is displayed in the highest walks of society; and when the people contemplate such scenes, even up to imperial palaces, how can we hope they will not imitate them?

A SCANDALOUS TRIAL.

Since I am speaking of these sad topics, I will say a few words about a recent judicial affair which has produced the most painful impressions. A monk, a Brother of the Christian Doctrine, named Brother Paul, was condemned on the 17th of July last to perpetual penal servitude, by the Tribunal of Versailles. Do you ask what crime he had committed, to bring upon his head so great a punishment? Alas! it is always the same story. These Brothers, friars, or Popish monks, make vows of celibacy, and when they cannot control their passions, they plunge into the most monstrous profligacy.

Brother Paul had been guilty of many assaults upon modesty, to use the terms of law. For a number of years, public opinion had kept a timid silence as to his enormities, for fear of disgracing the monkish character. At last the excesses of this unhappy man reached such a pitch that justice was compelled to interfere. The Romish Church ought to learn a serious lesson from this, and to understand, at length, that the obligation to perpetual celibacy often opens the way to the most detestable scandals. The Pope and the bishops would do well to say to themselves that the arbitrary ordinances of their communion cannot subdue natural instincts. But these serious lessons are lost, and the condemnation of this Brother Paul will alter nothing in the evil institutions of Romanism. The forced celibacy of the priests and monks gives the high dignitaries of the Vatican a servile agency, which they keep at all cost.

INFERIORITY OF OUR COUNTRY IN THE SPHERE OF PUBLIC EDUCATION.

Let us pass to a less painful subject. I have already mentioned in my correspondence the efforts making to improve and extend popular education. M. Duruy, Minister for Public Instruction, displays in this matter a zeal and an activity worthy of our praise. Besides other acts, he has sent inspectors, or distinguished professors, in order to examine scholastic establishments in other countries, and especially among Protestants. These servants of the Government have been sincere and faithful in the performance of their task. On their return to France, they have published official reports, in which they declare without reserve that Protestant nations are more advanced than the French in the matter of public instruction. Not only do they affirm our state of inferiority, but they rest their declarations upon numerous and irrefragable proofs. These avowals are not by any means flattering to the French people, who profess to be the first people in the world, and to march in the vanguard of humanity. But M. Duruy has not been stopped by the fear of wounding national pride, and has placed the interests of truth above everything else. Let us hope that our honourable Minister for Public Instruction will not lose the fruit of his courage and pains. But he encounters on the way terrible enemies—to wit, the Jesuits, bishops, priests, and monks, who, docile to the word of command from Rome, and stubborn in their old traditions, hinder with their whole might the extension of popular teaching. They labour to keep Popish clergy, and the French will not consent indefinitely to the humiliation of being, in their education and schools, lower than Protestant countries.

ATTACKS OF PROTESTANT RADICALS UPON THE SUPERNATURAL IN CHRISTIANITY.

I have little to communicate to you in this letter about the writings and doings of the Radical school in our Reformed Churches. Matters are unchanged. On the one side, the Evangelicals maintain and defend with immovable firmness the vital doctrines of Christianity, and employ all lawful means to triumph in a struggle which involves the most sacred interests of souls. On the other side, the Rationalists or Neologians, continue their attacks upon the Christian faith, seizing every opportunity to demolish the ancient edifice of the Reformation, and to put in its place I know not what Tower of Babel and image of chaos and anarchy.

One of the points which they contest with the most violence is the reality of miracles, or the supernatural element. This is their war-horse. They continually repeat that the Gospel altogether is concentrated in the two precepts of love to God and love to man, and that all the miraculous facts concerning the person and work of Christ are utterly insignificant. But is it not evident that such a religion is no more than a mere system of moral philosophy, a work of the human mind, an undecided and variable system of teaching, subject to all the variations of our own mental conceptions? If the super-

It is believed that in the undowed churches also of the city and of the vid, many a fervent prayer was presented for the welfare of this remarkable man, who holds so mighty an influence in our days. that the churches of Britain would join us in earnest petition that He "by whom kings reign and princes decree justice" may bless the monarch! What a glorious influence might this one man exert on the ir land of France, and other lands near and ar, were his heart but touched with the love of Christ, and his power consecrated to the service of the "Chief Ruler." Would that our fellow-Christians at home might remember the great country and him whom the King of Kings has set up as its governor.

MEETING OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

The annual meeting of the Academy has just been held, at which the usual prizes were distributed to those who had distinguished themselves by philanthropic and virtuous conduct. These prizes, amounting to about 10,000 francs per annum, were founded some one-and-forty years ago by the celebrated Antoine de Montyon. On this occasion the is of heroism and "virtue" of those to whom the rewards had been adjudged were recounted in an eloquent address by M. Sainte-Marie. Prizes were also awarded to those who during the year had rendered themselves remarkable by works of "high literature." The address of M. Villemain, pronouncing the adjudication, is worthy of mention, and is of special interest to us on the honourable terms in which he refers to two eminent gentlemen—Protestants and lovers of Evangelical truth—M. Jules Simonet and M. Rosseeuw St. Hilaire. The acts for which the prize was awarded to the former were "Historic Studies of the Period of the Reformation" (Olympia Morata and Calvin), and that which received the well-merited distinction by M. St. Hilaire was the ninth volume of his "History of Spain," specially recording some of the cruelties of the Inquisition, and of the war of Philip II. giving the Low Countries. "These works," said the venerable Secretary of the Academy, "are animated by that jealousy of religious liberty by which our age is so honoured . . . Nothing can better deserve the title [of "high literature"] than these wise and free testimonies rendered with talent to the spirit of tolerance, under the condition, however, that that tolerance be as general as it is sincere, and specially that it recognise rights superior to mere human power, and a religious authority all the more inviolable because it is unarmed." These words were warmly cheered, as they well deserved to be. The fact that they were uttered by one who fills such a position, and delivered from so exalted a station as the chair of the Academy, is a sign of the times.

The lecture delivered at this annual gathering by M. Saint-Marc Girardin is worthy a place in your record of the past month in Paris. The subject was "The Apologues and Parables of Antiquity," and the address was marked not only by learning and eloquence, but by moral and Christian sentiments. It is delightful to hear from such a quarter a warm acknowledgment and eulogium of "the grand and beautiful parables of the Old and New Testament." That of the poor man's lamb is given at large, with such remarks as these: "What an admirable parable is this! Nathan said unto David, 'Thou art the man.' What a revolution! What a home-thrust is there! How the allegory disappears in a moment! How the cloud breaks and the lightnings gleam!" After drawing a comparison between certain faithful preachers of modern times and the prophets of the Old Testament, he speaks of the latter in these terms: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of men who bring truth; because inspired by God they come to announce it to prince and people. They are not able to speak or to hold their peace of their own accord, since it is He who opens and who shuts their mouth." Then follows the quotation of Jeremiah's words, ch. i., v. 4-9. "These parables of the Bible," he continues, "have another merit, besides their having without cessation sustained truth amongst the Jews. They have sustained it and proclaimed it to the nations, even down to this day; all the world knows them, understands them, appreciates them. It is no small merit of the Christian religion to have given to the world these symbols which are the maxims of the State and of modern civilisation. Mark, too, how these symbols mutually illustrate and support and supplement each other. . . . The parable of the poor man's sheep—there is embodied justice. The lost sheep found and restored—there is embodied charity."

PROJECTED ORTHODOX ALLIANCE.

We hear this month of a project on foot for the promotion of an "Orthodox Alliance," and it will not be surprising to find it speedily developing into a vigorous and active association. Such concerted action appears needful to counteract the influence of the "Union Libérale." The Lien complains of this proposed organization in very amusing terms: "It will be to set temple against temple, worship against worship, to send missionaries into every parish to attack the ministry of the Liberal pastors, and undermine their influence amongst their people." The Liberals may use these tactics towards their opponents and form what societies they please, but that the Orthodox should follow their example is matter for bitter complaint. The advocate of this association has published his views in a brochure entitled "Projet d'Alliance défensive de l'Eglise Réformée de France contre les abus du Ministère, &c." He complains that "there are ministers who substitute for the Christ of God whom they have engaged to proclaim, some false Christ of human wisdom, which is folly in the sight of God." He cites some of the larger churches, as Paris, Lyons, Bordeaux, &c., where, by the side of faithful preachers of the Gospel of Christ, there stand up those whose aim is to neutralise and contradict the truth, and to teach and apologise for soul-destroying error; and more sadly still he bemoans the pitiable condition of those parishes which are wholly at the mercy of heterodox ministers—where the congregations never hear the doctrine of the Cross that alone can save; and where they who have embraced the truth can never hear the Gospel which they love and prize.

But let not British Christians suppose that the present struggle on this side the Channel indicates any progress amongst the Liberals or Freethinkers. Do not think that the "broad" theology is gaining ground in the Church of France. We believe it to be rather the gathering power of the Orthodox which is awakening to new energy the opposition of the anti-supernaturalists. Some forty years ago it is said that not more than five or six could have been found in this land who proclaimed the Gospel in its purity. Now, within the borders of the Reformed Church the Evangelicals are perhaps on a numerical equality with the Liberals, whilst among the Free Churches there are probably not less than 200 pastors and evangelists who earnestly contending for the faith or venerated to the saints.

THE FRENCH LUTHERAN CHURCH

In your review of French Protestantism the Lutherans must not be lost sight of. The Lutheran Established Church (Eglise luthérienne) embraces but 120,000 members, and 400 places of worship, and 400 pastors. These are chiefly to be found in the departments bordering on Germany, and are not confined to them. In Paris there are eight churches of this denomination, and many of the services in which the German language is used. The Protestant Establishment in Paris consists of 44 consistories or conseils presbytéraux, or kirk sessions. It appears to be almost more than the sister church under the control of the Government. The pastors are appointed by a Directory, of which the Ecclesiastical is named by the Government as a person of importance; it being the parish once in four years, to consecrate the pastors, and to exercise other episcopal functions. The eight directories are the supreme court of the Church, of which these conseils are members. The proceedings of this body have been published. It appears that the appointment of the pastors is not discussed, as it is sires no alteration. Its members embrace "all the forms of the great central belief of the ministers, all freedom of conscience they prefer. Notwithstanding the known desire of the subject, doctrinal way into the meeting is sistory. M. the indications afforded of life and growth in the Protestant Churches in the dedication of new places of worship. At Deauville, near Trouville, on the coast of Normandy, on the 10th of July, a large assembly was gathered, forming a miniature Evangelical Alliance. M. les Pasteurs Melon, President of the Reformed Consistory of Caen; Meyer, Inspector-Ecclésiastique of the Lutheran Church; Lognon, of Paris; and Edmond de Pressensé, of the Chapelle Taitbout, took part in the services. Nearly twenty other pastors were present, and a congregation of more than 100 of different Evangelical denominations thronged the new church, in which many of the frequenters of this rising watering-place will, it is hoped, hear the Gospel of salvation. Here, also, a house of prayer was dedicated at Château-Ponsac, near Villefavard (Haute Vienne), in which place Protestant worship has been conducted for upwards of ten years.

CONVERTS FROM ROMANISM.

It is refreshing to meet with any proofs of the power and progress of Divine truth in the very presence of the dominant superstitions of Romanism. Whilst you at home are watching "the Popish Crusade in England," and reckoning some of its triumphs, our readers will be grateful to receive tidings of some little progress made even here by faithful men, valiant for the truth. They would be deeply interested in the prosperity of a little New Testament church, flourishing under the very shadow of one of our largest Catholic cathedrals. The two pastors and eighty members of this communion are, it is believed without exception, converts from the Romish faith. They are now endeavouring to obtain funds that may enable them to migrate from their upper room, and rent a house for the worship of Him who called them from the darkness of Rome to the light of His truth.

PRAYER FOR THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES OF FRANCE.

Will British Christians remember the churches of Christ in this land? Brethren, pray for us. The churches of France need new life, new baptism from Heaven, a great and glorious revival of God's work. We want to see those men who are defenders of the faith against Rationalistic error going forth in the spirit of Whitefield or Wesley, to lay upon the population of this great country. What signs might follow the faithful, bold preaching of the old Gospel in its simplicity, empowered by the Spirit of the living God! May He who has given the Word send forth a great company to publish it with burning eloquence and quenchless zeal. Here, as elsewhere, the great problem to be solved is to comprehend in one church the agencies necessary for the spiritual education of cultivated people with those indispensable for the effectual evangelization of the natives. Is not the union of these functions the test of a true and standing church? Nor let any imagine that these agencies are antagonistic, as at first sight may appear. The one is not only helpful to the other, but each is indispensable to the full development of the other.

WORK AMONGST THE ENGLISH.

Your readers will be interested to know that their own countrymen in this city are not forgotten. The British population of Paris is supposed to be about as large as that of Exeter or York, and presents a wide field of work, for which the labourers are but few. We hear of services being established in different parts of the city and its environs. At Passy, at Neuilly, at Batignolles, at Ternes, at Asnières, at St. Denis, rooms are opened for worship. Two services, intended specially for grooms and jockeys, have been commenced, and English libraries established for their use, the one at Chantilly, the other near the Champs Elysées. These latter efforts are very encouraging; many have been induced to attend, and a deep interest appears to be awakened. At some of the places mentioned above Sunday-schools and Bible-classes have been established, and many tracts are being constantly distributed amongst the English residents.

FREEDMEN'S AID ASSOCIATION.

There have been formed in different parts of France, within the last few months, various associations to send help to the enfranchised slaves in America. The "Association des Dames Françaises en Faveur des Eclaves Afranchis" has already raised about 30,000fr., besides sending out large packages of garments free of charge, by the generosity of the railway and transatlantic companies. The first consignment was accompanied by a noble letter, breathing a truly Christian and sympathising spirit:—

Moved by the recital of the sufferings through which our enfranchised brethren are passing during their transition state, and full of sympathy in the work of reparation which you have undertaken for them, we have desired to associate ourselves with your labours, and now send the first-fruits of our efforts. . . . In this solemn moment, when the eyes of Europe are turned towards you, and a task more difficult than conquest on the field of battle is laid upon you, we, the women of France, reach forth the hand of friendship, with the desire that the bonds which have united our countries in the past may become each day more mighty in the future.

The letter has been re-

RAVAGES OF THE CHOLERA.

The universal subject of conversation and dread here at present is the cholera, which, after devastating Alexandria and Constantinople, has fastened upon Ancona. Two thousand cases in that city within a few weeks, and the outbreak of the plague in San Severo, have created a panic throughout the country.

People are flying in thousands to what are considered the healthiest spots, and the fine fruit of this season of the year finds few purchasers. A few sporadic cases have occurred in various districts of Italy, but the hope is general that, as the great heat is now passed, and rain has recently fallen copiously, and gales of wind have been occurring over the country, the ravages of the fatal morbus will be stayed. The popular dread exhibits itself in an unpleasing aspect. The ignorant peasantry attribute the infection to the Government, who poison the air with some deep political design. The mob of Palermo crave to have the street in which the first case occurs barricaded against all communication from without. In several of the isolated cases here and in the North, a medical man, with all appliances, has been shut up with the sufferers, and the house put in quarantine.

A lady visited her two daughters the other day at Sanzana, but within a quarter of an hour it became known, or was suspected, that she came from Ancona, and the whole population arose and drove her from the town. The case of greatest cruelty, however, is that of a gentleman, travelling southwards from Ancona to Foggia. Seized with cholera on the way, he got out at a station and took the express train back to Ancona. A medical

At Viareggio interment in coffins is refused by the local authority, although in accordance with the law of the land. In Sassari and in Alessandria the meetings are invaded by disturbers of the peace, and riots are produced, for the purpose of shutting up the places of Evangelical worship. At Brescia the funeral cortège of a worthy custom-house officer is hustled and hooted—the priests in this, as in other cases, being pre-eminent in the fray. At La Tour, the capital of the Waldensian Valleys, where few Romanists reside, a Protestant shopkeeper is intimidated and maltreated for keeping open his shop while a procession was passing, and a considerable disturbance ensues. At Lucca and Arcola the priests most offensively shout “Victory!” and harangue in the newspapers or over the grave against the Evangelicals, because persons who had only sometimes attended the Evangelical church, at were never recognised as members adherents, had recanted their so-called heresies. At Assola, again, a priest in high office condescends to push himself unbidden into an Evangelical family when one of its members is dying. A colporteur in the Basilicata is rudely treated, and on two occasions has a portion of his stock burned in the public square before his eyes, once at Colobraro, where the priest collected among the bystanders and bought twenty francs’ worth of Bibles and Testaments, and again at Montemilone, near Melfi, where thirty francs’ worth were purchased, and, amidst much excitement, committed to the flames.

It should be mentioned, however, that at Lucca, and other places, similar outrages have been prevented by the energetic syndics, who have not scrupled to fine or imprison the offenders and protect the Evangelicals concerned; while at Rio Marina, in Elba, and elsewhere, vast crowds have from curiosity attended Protestant funerals, and conducted themselves with the utmost decorum, being seemingly impressed favourably with the services. It should also be noticed that the report of these proceedings, like that at Brescia, in the public prints, has called forth editorial and popular indignation against the priests and their myrmidons.

POSITION AND POWER OF THE PRIESTHOOD.

In fact, these cases, and other political interferences, are thrusting before the attention of the public the whole question of the position and power of the priesthood. A tract, written the other day by Dr. De Sanctis, is circulating widely under the title of “Why is the Priesthood wished for in Italy?” He shows clearly the inconsistency, so notable everywhere, that the priest is in bad odour, is disliked and spoken against, yet no one will dispense with his religious services, and that not the abolition of the “temporal power” of the Pope alone will give relief, but that only the practical neglect by the people of the priesthood will bring about the overthrow of the politico-religious system of the Papacy, which stands in the way of all progress and enlightenment. A Lucca priest, who very naturally withholds his name, also scatters abroad a remarkable letter he wrote to the People's Journal of Florence, advocating similar views. He shows that to imprison a priest here and there, or withhold his pay, or fulminate diatribes against him, because he will not pray for the King, or attend the national festa, or absolve a dying Liberal, is only to prove the importance of the man, and that his prayers and his presence and his priestly functions are really sought after and appreciated; whereas the true way to humble the clerical faction is to pass them by without notice, to have no faith in them, as necessarily the sworn foes of liberty, and to dispense on all occasions with their services. This is plain speaking on the part of a priest, and scarcely to be believed as authentic, were it not that the very journals which strive after a reconciliation of the throne and the altar, and which are written mostly by Liberal priests, are full to overflowing with exposés of the intolerance and bigotry of their own brethren. The other question—of the propriety of out-of-church-door processions—which I noticed last month as under discussion in the journals, is still on the tapis, through the eccentric action of Don Ambrogio in Turin, where he has been the means of stopping the famous procession of the “Madonna degli Angeli.” He seems to have wished to take part with the clergy before starting, and then to have addressed the multitude outside, who were about equally divided in their sympathy and opposition to him, on the gross abuses of the priesthood. The clergy, who knew the intrepid party they had to deal with, would not start the procession, which in the end never left the church, unless the magistrates would afford them a strong posse of police—a request to which the syndic of Turin thus replied: “It is my duty to maintain order, and I shall not be wanting in this; but if a procession cannot take place without an imposing military force to repress inevitable disorder, it seems to me more Christian to suspend and suppress the service itself ; " a reply which has been favourably received by the public.

TYRANNY OF THE PAPAL RULE IN ROME.

I have seen a good deal of late of a friend from Rome and a member of the National Committee there, whose descriptions of the state of things in the Eternal City sadden the heart of the patriot and the Christian. I cannot give the name, and must be particularly cautious even in this short reference to the circumstances ; but this person assures me that friends are suffering severely in the prisons of Rome merely for liberty and conscience' sake, for free opinions or the suspicion of them. I am assured that they are let starve and die, and that fever is let riot among them, and that only the feeblest help of a few daring women, who persist in claiming the right of a weekly visit, can reach them in their dungeons. All this in the name of religion and by the orders of the Pope ! How it makes one long with a more earnest longing for the speedy advent of the time when the Lord will sweep away the Papacy with the breath of His mouth, and cause all the nations to rejoice with a hearty and intelligent joy that " Babylon is fallen ! "

POLITICAL STAGNATION.

In political affairs there is a complete stagnation. It is singular to notice that of late years the habit has become general in France and Italy, as at home, from the prince down to the working man, of considering July and August as the period of the long vacation. Everyone, of every age and profession, is in the country, at the baths, making an excursion. I know of various towns in France and elsewhere, where, ten or fifteen years ago, scarcely one was from home at this season, whereas now you will certainly meet your friend more readily at the railway station or in the country retreat than at his own house at home. Our predecessors neither had the facilities nor did they require the " outings " of present-day folk, for they lived a quieter and more healthful life. Now that the vital energy is expended much faster, and that we travel through life at express speed, it is well to bring the machine to a standstill for a little, even when not necessitated by the invasion of disease, to restore the waste and repair the " wear and tear " against the severe strain and long pull of another ten-month labour.

THE KING : AN OMINOUS WHISPER.

It is whispered about confidently that the King is resolved to go to Rome, fas aut nefas, popularly or unpopularly, and that the Ministry is greatly disturbed and divided by reason of this decision, which bodes ill good to Italy or to the Savoy dynasty. Like his father, the highest in the land has taken to the rosary, attends the daily mass with much devoutness, confesses to his priest with great frequency, and frankly acknowledges all around him that he is in distress on account of his personal and political past life, and that only the Pope can give him absolution and peace by bestowing his blessing on the uneasy head that wears the Italian crown. This is what has been feared by many would take place as years rolled over the head of Victor Emmanuel. These and other things have given rise to the general conviction, that despite the opposition of Parliament and the intelligence of the country, the King either has initiated, or is too ready to initiate fresh communications of a more private kind with the Pope, and is displaying a willingness to concede more than a constitutional monarch can or dare, and that this is bringing up the hopes of the politicians of the Papacy.

SWITZERLAND.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN THE FRENCH AND GERMAN CANTONS.

Lausanne, Aug. 2, 1865.

If very often I have been embarrassed when I had to write to you, not having anything truly worthy of your interest to communicate, it is not so to-day. I hope my country is about to enter altogether upon the path of religious liberty, that conquest which is so precious and so dear to the Evangelical Alliance. Already the three cantons of French Switzerland—Geneva, Vaud, and Neuchâtel—had all accepted it as a fact, if they had not professed it ; but German Switzerland, to a great extent whether Catholic or Protestant, was absolutely ignorant of it twenty years ago. Nevertheless, in 1848 there was obtained liberty for recognised forms of worship—it is to say, for official Protestantism and Catholicism ; though in the case of mixed marriages there have been constantly difficulties with the authorities. Yet this would not have sufficed to bring about an advance

as liberty, if Holland and France ven a lesson to our intolerant can-using to conclude any treaty of com-of free settlement with Switzerland, ther citizens. Some cantons hav-

peace." The question is now ussion before the public, and the this liberty into our laws has just e by the President of the Swiss ion. In an anonymous pamphlet, scribed to him, he pleads earnestly the difficulties with foreign Go-

Council of State consented to ausenting meetings, and presented a law to this effect to the Grand the canton, but the draft was regh, it is true, by a feeble majority.
French cantons we have been af-all these acts of intolerance, and lar the committees of the Evanliance. To that of Geneva be-honour of having made the first movement on behalf of the deof our persecuted brethren. A ry explicit and very firm, and re-both for substance and form, has essed by the Genevese Committee Council of State, to the Grand and to the people of Appenzell

(R.E.), to ask, as an act of justice and a Christian duty, religious liberty for all Dissenters. This letter, having appeared in the German and French journals, has made a great stir, and an Appenzell journal has felt called on to reply to our brethren of Geneva.

At Lausanne, our committee has judged that it could not do less than give its full and entire adhesion to the principles and sentiments set forth in the letter from Geneva. We have therefore written in this sense to the Government of Appenzell, and published our adhesion in the journals.
Neuchatel, we hope, will do the same. May our feeble endeavours be crowned with success, so that free Helvetia may not have to reproach itself for oppressing consciences, and for being more jealous of its political rights than of that which permits to all its inhabitants to lift freely both their hands and their hearts to heaven!

You will not learn with less interest that if the Evangelical Alliance does not make progress in the Canton de Vaud as a distinct organization and society, its principles are largely diffused in various places. From year to year the number of summer meetings increases. At these the brethren of all denominations are invited to speak in the open air, and often to considerable multitudes.
They have been instituted around Lausanne, and upon many of our Alpine heights. I learn that in the park of Madame de Stael, at Copet, an assembly of this kind has just been held, where Nationalists and Dissenters, brethren of Geneva and of Vaud, have united to proclaim before a numerous gathering the unsearchable riches of Christ.

The committee desires to encourage meetings for mutual edification without ecclesiastical distinction. These have hitherto had a private character, but the question is asked, whether it would not be possible to effect during the winter, in a hall, what is practised with great edification during the summer under the vault of heaven. It cannot be doubted that there prevails a necessity for inter-communion between the members of the body of Christ; and if all, chiefly among the clergy of the National Church, do not rally around us, there is still progress. It is very necessary that the brethren should keep united to resist the current of the world, which is always growing stronger. Sunday is, to a very great many, nothing but a day of worldly holiday-making and dissipation; and hence the progress of religious indifference, libertinism, and drunkenness. May God be our helper! Pray for us.

sionaries sent out by a Swedish society direct to heathen lands. The most difficult undertaking the committee of the National Institute has had, is the publishing of an old, very good, but also very large commentary on the Bible, which has required rather extensive loan transactions for the editing, printing and binding departments, while in the meantime the payment for the parts of the work only are slowly coming in to the committee. Last year was (for what reasons I do not know) remarkable for its pressure in pecuniary matters in this country. Money was more scarce than had been the case for some years before, and this has been felt also by the Christian societies and enterprises in general. I hope that, since the American war is finished, a change for the better will take place. The colporteur school in my house goes on, in spring and autumn, hopefully, and though it gives me some trouble and care, undoubtedly the Lord has also given me in connexion with it many

Constantinople, August 9, 1865.
CONSTANTINOPLE.

The great annual pilgrimage of Mohammedans to Mecca has this year brought upon the world a curse, which should rouse the Governments of Europe to take most decided measures against this absurd custom, which is now maintained only by funds furnished by the Turkish Government. The Turkish officials in Constantinople claim that the pestilence this year is the fault of a single man, small space. The Turkish Pasha of Jedda should have the refuse of these sheep prepared for the purpose, but neglected his duty, and under the burning sun the result was the immediate cholera among the pilgrims alleged to have perished 46,000 died in two days Medina. Of course, I cannot truth of this story; but I were taken from the ship to the hospital arsenal, and a week later the disease red most unmistakably in the great and Turkish quarter behind the arsenal.

t the same time it appeared at a village
e Bosphorus where the Pasha of Egypt it, in spite of all this, the disease has ily increased in extent and malignancy, the number of deaths has exceeded one thing is thought of or talked of but

, and no one feels that he has more than a few hours' lease of life. The people fly from one point to another in the vain hope of escaping the disease, and many thousands are encamped upon the hills, in tents and booths. Thousands have crowded the steamers leaving the city for the Black Sea, hundreds of whom have died by the way, and found a watery grave. The steam-packet companies have crowded their steamers with at least five times the proper number of passengers, taking from 1,200 to 2,000 deck passengers at a trip. Upon these decks have occurred scenes too horrible for description, a hundred deaths taking place in a single night in some instances.

The terror among those who remain may be illustrated by the fact that after the breaking out of the disease at Therapia, a small village on the Bosphorus, the English Vice-Consul and a few friends united to collect and bury the deserted dead. They found no less than fifty, whose friends had fled from them in horror and dismay. Mr.
Hughes, the Oriental Secretary of the British Embassy, has done a noble work in that village, and has been almost unaided by the natives. Rev. Mr. Trowbridge and Rev. Mr.
Long, American missionaries, have laboured constantly among the poor in the great khans of Stamboul, and have undoubtedly saved hundreds of lives, as these men have no families to care for them, and have such a fear of the cholera hospitals that they prefer to die alone and uncared for in their rooms, rather than apply to the Government physicians. I have not the time or space to mention here the names of others who have laboured as opportunity offered among those who lived near them or were in their service; but it may be said generally of the British and American residents that they have acted with the greatest courage and efficiency among all classes. I have yet to learn of a single instance where any person has taken the disease while caring for the wants of the sick.

CHARACTER OF THE DISEASE.

The disease, as it now exists in Constantinople, is unquestionably the most malignant form of Asiatic cholera. I have seen it in its worst form in my own family, from which it has taken a precious child. He was stricken down as by lightning, while he was quietly sleeping in my own room. No reason can be given why the disease should have selected him.
On the contrary, there was every reason why it should not. He was in perfect matters, the course of which produced the impression—"All felt there was something impending." Nothing, however, was apprehended beyond "seizure of property, and an expulsion from the country." His own work being finished, he started for the coast, the King being absent from Gondar, the capital, when he left. He was proceeding on his journey, when, at Woggera, he writes—

To my surprise I saw the King's white tent glimmering in the sun's rays on one of the heights which dot the plateau. Duty as well as courtesy forbade me to advance without saluting his Majesty. This induced me to halt, and towards the afternoon I proceeded, accompanied by two servants, one of whom spoke a little Arabic, to the royal camping ground. After waiting about two hours his Majesty came into the open air. Myself and attendants immediately made a most humble obeisance. There was a frown on the King's countenance which augured nothing auspicious. Between the first question and the death of my two servants the hand of time could not have advanced ten minutes. The gloom of approaching night, the rattling of the sticks, and my own doubtful fate, mechanically prompted me to put my hand to my lips, or, as it was said, to put a finger into my mouth. This was construed into a crime, and in less time than these lines take to pen, I was stripped, beaten, and almost lifeless on the ground. Wounded, bruised, and bleeding, my executioners dragged or rather carried me down the hill, where my swollen wrist was fastened by a hoop and chain to the arm of a soldier. My guardian, moved with compassion, tried to staunch with rank grass the blood which profusely welled out of more than a score of gashes and scars, but finding the effort useless he wrapped himself in his shama, and with my battered form clinging to him, fell asleep. I also sank several times into a feverish stupor, and oh! how gladly would I have passed the wearisome hours of night in forgetfulness, had not the shifting motion of blood in my mouth and throat denied me this indulgence. At daylight I was given in charge of several chiefs, whilst the King moved on to Gondar.

His guards, however, and the villagers behaved kindly to the unfortunate man. Orders had been sent that he should be fettered hand and foot; but his ankles were too much inflamed to be ironed without great agony, and so the royal order was transgressed. His left hand was tied to his right foot, and, in that state, he and his servants were marched to Gondar. There his luggage was searched. Referring to this period, he writes:—

My prospects now looked bright and hopeful, when unexpectedly his Majesty was informed that I had papers unfavourable to him. This was exactly four weeks after my beating and incarceration. Not dreaming of anything inauspicious, and animated by the sweet hope of liberty, I passed the greater part of the day in conversation with my guards—when, unexpectedly, Samuel [a professed convert], and a party of soldiers came rushing into my prison, seized every article in it, and carried them off to the King. My Egyptian servant, Joseph, who had been my fellow-prisoner, though not in chains, was requested to follow. Two hours of torturing suspense had elapsed, when bags, boxes, &c., were again brought back, minus every paper and book. They had been handed to M. Bardell, who acted as examiner, and now and then the King said Cobab (my name) is belhadanya (clever man); then again, a toungoulanya (a cunning rascal). The glowing prospects of freedom and restoration to the bosom of my family from that hour sank from before my mind's vision. In the evening I was given in charge of severer guards, and tied hands and feet. Twenty-five soldiers and five chiefs were now appointed as my regular guard. No stranger was allowed to approach my tent. A servant of the chief gaoler now and then baked me a few flat cakes, and brought me a leather bottle of water. Some of the guards, in whose good graces I had wormed myself, informed me that I had an enemy at Gondar, and snapping their fingers (a sign that all is over), ejaculated, "We are all dust, and must die!"

After several days of suspense and suffering came a gleam of hope. Mr. Stern was now told that the longed-for letter from the British Government would arrive in two days, and that he would be liberated. That period elapsed, and he was called before the King:—

I immediately obeyed the summons, but, instead of a private interview with the monarch, I found the whole army drawn up in a square, the utmost line of which was occupied by a kind of throne on which sat the King, shaded by silken umbrellas. On the left side of his Majesty I noticed Messrs. Bardel and Zauder, and on the right a host of priests and scribes, whilst in the interior of the square, squatted on carpets, were ranged, in opposite lines, the King's European workmen, H.B.M.'s Consul, and the missionaries. Scarcely one of the Europeans ventured to gaze at me, whilst myriads of black glittering eyes vainly tried to pierce my inmost soul. On looking round I saw Rosenthal in chains standing about a hundred steps from me.

They were to be judged according to a code which pronounces the penalty of death on all who by speech or writing offend the King.

Ten articles, I believe, were brought forward against me, and the most formidable of these were the assertion that a war between the King and a foreign Power would remove intolerance and introduce religious liberty; that since the death of Mr. Bell the King had no good counsellor; that various provinces, and also Genda, had been plundered; and lastly, that in passing a place where lay bleaching in the rays of the sun 700 or 800 skulls, I had stated in my diary that they had been murdered in cold blood. The only offensive statement in my book, of which I had unfortunately one copy, was the pedigree of his Majesty, and the last heavy crime consisted of my having added a few harmless and complimentary notes from the Metropolitan. Rosenthal's sins (which were laid upon me, though I knew not a word of what he had written till that very moment) consisted in some remarks about the King's private life in a letter to a relative in London. Myself and Rosenthal, not-random, and her eyes fell upon the composing words of Joseph to his brethren—"Fear not; I will nourish you and your little ones." God did bless the supply of Mrs. R.'s nourishment, so that she kept the two poor babes, ours and Mrs. Flad's, for three days from famishing. They were however, soon brought to the camp, and at the end of January permitted to visit us. O my God! what a meeting this of mine with my poor wife and child, after two months' separation under such trying circumstances! I pass over the liberation of the German missionaries, a painful illness and operation of Mrs. R., and a dangerous fever of the child, and come to Sunday, February 29. On that day the King asked something of Mr. Stern in reference to the Bible which I happened to answer, and being thus informed he gave immediate orders for the opening of my chains. I was indulged also to occupy the same tent with Mrs. R. within a few yards of the European prisoners, and thank God, we both say, we were never since separated. Thus we remained until that fearful evening, the 12th of May, only alluded to by Mr. S., when we were tortured. Mrs. R., hearing our groans and cries, rushed out of her tent towards us, and with the baby in her arms (who was then only ten months old) was beaten, knocked down, trod upon, and dragged back to the tent senseless. The marks of this treatment were visible after many days. That evening the poor child relapsed, and remained weak and sickly for many months. When Mrs. R. revived, she lamented and agonized over the supposed death of myself and Mr. S. I was at last conducted back to her, lacerated, and with the distorted features of a madman. The same tragedy was re-performed the following evening upon three of us [Captain Cameron was the third], and Mrs. R.'s sad pleasure consisted afterwards in healing our impotent arms. [The torture seems to have been the tying of ropes round the missionaries' arms so tight that the blood oozed out at the finger ends.] I was again chained, and remain so ever since. We passed the incessant rains of a tropical winter in an old torn tent, experienced many disappointed hopes, were dragged two and two, chained together, across the country on mules, every moment in danger of pulling one another off our animals and breaking one's neck; and when arriving here were huddled together with about 200 persons of various ranks, ages, and sexes, with real or supposed crimes attached to them, and variously chained, and stuffed in a place about sixty feet in diameter. . . . We came here to preach the Gospel, but God taught us practical lessons out of it. We have indeed experienced the believer's portion in an eminent and extraordinary degree. "No exemption from but great help under afflictions. No overflows. No scaldings!" Why, then, should we despair for the future! Our covenant God will bring us back to you, restore to us our Christian privileges in a Christian country, and our lost liberty. And though He tarry long, yet will I wait for his time!

Since the above was in type, we have learned from the Record that another letter has been received from the Rev. H. A. Stern, dated so recently as the 30th May last. It was written under circumstances of painful privation, which mark the rigours to which the prisoners are subjected, and it is abruptly closed, from the exhaustion of the only scrap of paper obtainable. Yet, while thus evidencing a state of suffering, its tone is firmly reliant, and on the whole hopeful. Most earnestly does the captive entreat, for himself and fellow-prisoners, a continued interest in the prayers of God's people at home. May they be unceasingly remembered at the "throne of grace." The relatives of the captives have recently addressed a joint memorial to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Gifford Palgrave has been entrusted by the Government with the mission of endeavouring to obtain the release of the captives; but it is at present doubtful whether he will be allowed to enter the country.

MADAGASCAR.

MISSION WORK ON THE NORTH-EAST COAST.

It will be remembered that the Church Missionary Society is represented in Madagascar by two missionaries, stationed in the province of Vohimare, on the north-east coast. The journal of one of these—the Rev. R. Maundrell—throws considerable light upon the character and habits of portions of the population of whom little has hitherto been known. We quote a portion of this interesting communication from the Church Missionary Intelligencer:—

Jan. 7, 1865.—To-day Mr. Campbell and I have witnessed the sacrifice of an ox. It was brought to the middle of the Sakalava town, and there thrown down, and made fast by the legs. Rascanoro, a Sakalava woman, who has attended many of our meetings, placed one small vase of incense on the ground, a little distance in front of the ox, and another a little distance behind it. She then poured some water over the ox from a bottle. After this, Rafojia, the chief of the Sakalavas in this part of Madagascar, kneeling down, prayed to Yanahary ("God"), and to the razana ("the ancestors"), on behalf of a sick child, for whose recovery the ox was being offered up. When Rafojia had finished, an old Sakalava woman also invoked Yanahary and the razana, and then the ox was slain by an Arab. When the ceremony was finished, Rascanoro and many others listened to me attentively while I told them that God is the only hearer and answerer of prayer.

Jan 8: Lord's-day.—On our way to Hiarana yesterday I saw the remains of another bullock that had been offered up in sacrifice by the Saka-plant their rice. Many of them are in the fields, working on their small lots of land. The service this morning was consequently thinly attended.

Feb. 1.—The Malagasy flag has been flying to-day in honour of the arrival of Ramanansoa. This man is bitterly opposed to Christianity. When invited to dine with the Governor, some time ago, and on the Governor's saying grace, he left the table.

Feb. 5, Lord's-day.—Had our usual services to-day. The Governor, whom I had not seen all he week, came to breakfast. He has suffered or several days past from fever, and is looking him and weak. Poor man, I am afraid he has a very difficult position to fulfil, and receives but very little sympathy from any of his officers. Here he lives in the midst of the Rova, where Satan's seat is, surrounded by unbelief, ignorance, superstition, idolatry, and blind opposition to the truth. He disclosed to me the fact that Ramanansoa (see journal of Feb. 1), who professed such friendship for us when he called the other day, is doing all in his power to prevent our settling at Amboanio, and that he held a habary last evening with Radozy, the second commander, the three idol-keepers, and many other influential men, for the purpose of speaking to the Governor on the subject. The Governor was made acquainted with their deliberations by a friend, and was consequently troubled in mind the whole of the night. After conversing a little on this matter, we read together the 2nd and 3rd Psalms, and were greatly comforted in the thought that the Lord of all flesh is our hope and confidence.

Feb. 6.—The second commander of Angoney, who arrived yesterday on a friendly visit to the Governor, called on us to-day. He had on a beautifully clean dress and lamba. Ramanansoa accompanied him, and professed the greatest friendship.

Feb. 9.—Heard from the Governor the result of the three habarys, which were held respectively on Saturday, Monday, and yesterday by the enemies of the truth, for the purpose of expelling Mr. Campbell and me from Amboanio, and of confining us to Hiarana. The Governor and a few others fought hard against them, reminded them that it was by their consent we came to Amboanio, showed them their folly and duplicity, and told them they ought to remember the good England has done to Madagascar; that missionaries have only one object in coming to their country—the present and eternal welfare of the people; and finally he ended all dispute by saying that he would not consent to any of their measures, but quietly await the Queen's message. What a source of thankfulness to God! what a monument of the power of his grace we have in the Governor! Nothing is plainer than that the Lord has placed him here for the defence of his truth.

The second commander of Angoney called for medicines this morning. I asked him to take some copies of the New Testament and Psalms with him for those people at Angoney who are able to read, which he did, with a copy of the Prayer-book. Thus the Word of God is preaching us to surrounding towns and districts not yet visited by the missionary. From what we have heard of Angoney I am led to think that it may be a good centre for missionary operations.

It is healthy, with nearly as many inhabitants as Amboanio, and what is of great importance, it is only about two days' march from Maranaset, a district as thickly populated as Tamatave.

Feb. 11.—The Governor and his wife came and informed us fully of the battle he fought with our enemies. They have been defeated in their wicked attempt to remove us to Hiarana; and finding that Mr. Campbell and I go everywhere among the people here, and that we intend going to the regions beyond as soon as convenient, they have become on a sudden so solicitous of our welfare, and equally desirous of fulfilling to the utmost one of the laws of the Queen, which commands them to protect the missionaries, that they intend coming in a body to beseech us not to venture out alone, or go far from Amboanio, lest we may be killed by robbers, or stabbed by an evil-disposed Sakalava. In the midst of this opposition it is very comforting to witness the love that some of our friends have for the Word of God.

Feb. 25.—This is the first day of the Malagasy new year of 1865. All their houses (and ours too) have been decorated by new mats, called Tsihy manulrosa—i.e., "invitation mats"—mats on which they invite their friends to sit and feast with them. All cooking utensils have been thoroughly cleansed, and every person is dressed in a new or nicely washed lamba, or European suit. The flag was hoisted at the Rova early in the morning. The cannons were fired this afternoon, and men, women, and children are either singing, playing, or drinking.

Feb. 26: Lord's-day.—This has been a strange day, as a brief account of its proceedings will show. At half-past seven A.M. took place the baptism of Ratsiza. He is a native of Amboanio, and has never left the district. The account of his conversion is so interesting that I must not omit it. A Hova man of Angoney was his first teacher, who taught him to read, and preached the truth to him. The people had not then heard of the release of the Christians by Radama II., and Ratsiza and his friend often retired to the sea-side to read, sing, and pray in secret.

His second teacher was Raindreperenina, who is now at Tamatave, a dear friend of good old Symeon of Moka, Mauritius, and who when at Tamatave, on his way to the north of Madagascar, about two years ago, wrote to Mauritius for books for the people of Vohemare. On his arrival here he preached the Gospel of Christ to the people of Amboanio, and sanctified his teaching by a holy and consistent life. He became a great blessing to Ratsiza, who was his almost only Christian friend. On his departure he took Ratsiza out of the town to admonish him for the last time. They wept and prayed together, and Raindreperenina gave Luke xii. 4, 5, to Ratsiza as his parting words. From that time till now, Ratsiza, as the Governor says, whose scribe he is, has shone as a light in a dark place. He is about twenty-five years of age, and his past and present conduct leads us to hope that he will be a most efficient preacher of the Gospel to his fellow-countrymen, either as a layman, or, if released from the "fanompoana," as an ordained minister. The baptismal ceremony was performed by Mr. Campbell, in the presence of the Governor and about twenty-five of our friends.

Sydney, New South Wales,

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The Church of England in this colony has just passed through a crisis that seemed to be dangerous. About four months ago a Conference of the diocese of Sydney, consisting of clergymen and lay delegates, having been summoned by the Bishop, met in the metropolis, to devise a scheme for the establishment of a Synod. The Rev. Canon Allwood, whose views were expressly stated by the Bishop to be in accordance with his own, proposed that the Conference should apply to the Legislature for "an Enabling Bill," simply authorising the members of the Church of England to form Synods. One party in the Conference—of whom the Rev. W. Stuck, a clergyman distinguished by the eloquence of fervent piety and the fidelity of many years zealous labours in the colony, may be regarded as the representative—held that no legislation at all was necessary; that the Church possessed power in herself to discharge her proper functions. A third party, led by Mr. Robert Johnson, an attorney distinguished by his very lucrative practice and a seat in the Legislative Council, held, on the contrary, that a mere Enabling Act would not be sufficient—that the Conference ought to draw up a set of "fundamental constitutions," and ask the Legislature to legalize them as the constitutions of the United Church of England and Ireland in this diocese. The Conference, which was a numerous one, preferred the counsel of the attorney to that of the clergyman; and, adopting certain "constitutions" drawn up by Mr.

principle of colonial point of a weightier character, least of the promoters arisen from another quar Bishop of Newcastle, D dressed to the members England in his diocese a the evils which would passing of the "Sydney Bill," and recommending withdrawn, and a general Church of England in the to consider and sanction Temporalities Bill." I mail the Bishop's letter in the Empire newspaper of basis of his argument, principle, that "The Church a spiritual body; its highest spiritual, ministering spiritual members. Its highest spiritual discipline, and ment is the loss of spiritual expulsion or excommunication in its highest character, every member remaining free choice, for the sal blessings which he there submit to any discipline he does so of his own may not lose the spiritual membership by expulsion any branch of the Church accepted the aid of the communion with her—special civil privileges on with her, or by imposing abilities on those not in h ralities Bill may, in the new circumstances of the Church, be necessary, for "churches, parsonages, schools, burial grounds, glebes, and other endowments," but nothing more. He maintains "that it would be unreasonable and invidious for the Church to ask the Legislature for any other kind of Church Act;" and hopes that if she does so, "the Legislature will refuse her unwise and unreasonable request."

The Bishop afterwards embodied his chief objections in a petition to the Legislative Assembly, where it was received by many members with a lively expression of satisfaction. Whether the promoters of the Bill are convinced by the Bishop's arguments of the unfitness of that measure, or whether they are apprehensive that, in the face of such an opposition, it would be vain to expect to carry it, they have, at all events, allowed the session to come to a close without any further effort to press it forward. And before another session it may be expected that the principles so clearly and forcibly set forth by the Bishop of Newcastle will have still further leavened the minds of the members of the Church, and increased the numbers and the determination of the opponents of the measure, both in and out of Parliament.

PRESBYTERIAN UNION.

The happy sequel of the Preliminary Union which took place in November, and of which an account was published in Evangelical Christendom, was attained on Wednesday last, 14th June, when, after a week's conference on the last remaining points, the negotiating churches came to a unanimous agreement, and after united thanksgiving to the God of peace, fixed the 8th of September for the official and public consummation of the Union. The churches thus united are—(1), the Synod of Australia, in connexion with the Established Church of Scotland; (2), the Synod of Eastern Australia, founded two years after the great Disruption on the principles of the Free Church of Scotland; (3), the Synod of New South Wales, founded by the Rev. Dr. Lang and his colleagues, on the voluntary system in 1850; and (4), the minister and congregation of the "United Presbyterian Church." The second and third of these united in November last, forming the General Synod. When the consummation has taken place a fuller review of the work of union will be appropriate. As that work is virtually accomplished, and a committee of all the uniting Churches is arranging the schemes of operation for the General Assembly which is to meet in September, a lively satisfaction is felt in all parts of the land; thanksgiving for the success vouchsafed to the Conference, and prayer for the Divine blessing upon the consolidated Church, are ascending from many a household and congregation in New South Wales.

AMERICA.

New York, August 7.

THE NATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL.*

The Congregational Council which was convened in Boston in June last, was, in some particulars, the most noticeable religious body that has assembled in this country for a long while. I meant to write you an account of it a month ago; but a temporary sickness prevented me. By this time, no doubt, very many of your readers will have received, from other sources, some information concerning so interesting a convention. Yet a notice of its characteristic features ought to be recorded upon the pages of Christendom. A body that represented the Congregational Churches of this country could not but be large and respectable. Some of the best known names in America were upon the roll of the Council; and a very large measure of characteristic American zeal of course was present in a reunion of the religious progeny of New England. It was surely a fine idea to bring together in Boston, as the war was closing, the diffused representatives of that earnest Puritan race, who, two and a-half centuries ago, almost upon that very spot, had helped to plant those principles of religion and just government to which the nation had now owed its steadfastness and triumph. The Council was called, however, with an eye to results more than to sentiment. The Congregational Churches of this country, like the Unitarian, which continue Congregational in government, seem to have been reminded by the national struggle for "union," that, whatever evils may be thought to reside in certain forms of ecclesiastical organization, their denomination could not attain to its greatest strength and efficiency without some sort of concert and co-operation. The new condition of the nation, demanding as it does the vigorous employment of every religious influence, furnished the motive for the present experiment. The designation of the leading committees of the Council will sufficiently indicate the ends which it was thought important to gain. These committees presented elaborate reports on "Evangelization in the West and South;" on "Parochial Evangelization;" on "Education for the Ministry;" on "Ministerial Support;" on "Church Polity;" on "Declaration of Christian Faith;" and on "Systematizing Benevolent Contributions."

* [Although a notice of this assembly appeared in our last number, we should do injustice, not only to the writer but to our readers, were we to omit the account given above, from another and independent source, presenting, as it does, several new points of interest.]

The reports which elicited the most discussion were those which concerned "Church Polity," and "A Declaration of Christian Faith." It is easy to see that these are the very points upon which a council of Congregational Churches would be apt to have difficulty. All the other topics could be discussed with equal interest, and, for the most part, in similar terms in any council, or synod, or conference. But the settlement of a church polity or of a doctrinal platform by a council of independent churches would necessarily be a task of no little delicacy and difficulty. The strife, as in the late Unitarian Convention, lay between the radical and the conservative elements of the body. The western members, chiefly, resisted any extensive definition of doctrine, and any declaration of policy that should conflict with the practical independence of individual churches. The more thoughtful representatives of the eastern congregations saw how an equivocal statement of Evangelical doctrine and an acknowledged deference of individual churches to the judgment of neighbouring churches could not fail to conciliate the confidence and respect of the religious community, and to prove a safeguard to the churches themselves. The details of the debate you will not expect me to give. The results, which were decided by large majorities, while they involved some concessions upon the part of the conservatives, will not diminish the respect in which this large and influential denomination is held in the American Church. The declaration of doctrine was made, with no little dramatic effect, upon the very Rock of Plymouth, to which the Council had taken an excursion. It is brief and untechnical. But it recites, in clear language, all those fundamental truths upon which Evangelical Christians rest for comfort and salvation. The definition of church polity took a shape which, from its brevity and interest, I quote entire:—

Resolved, That this Council recognises as distinctive of the Congregational polity—

First, The principle that the local or Congregational Church derives its power and authority directly from Christ, and is not subjected to ecclesiastical government exterior or superior itself.

Second, That every local or Congregational Church is bound to observe the duties of mutual respect and charity which are included in communion of churches one with another; that every church which refuses to give account of its proceedings, when kindly and orderly desired by neighbouring churches, violates the law of Christ.

Third, That the ministry of the Gospel members of the churches who have been called and set apart to that work, imply itself no power of government, and that ministers of the Gospel not elected to office in any church are not a hierarchy, nor are they invested with any official power in or over the churches.

The Council resolved that an effort made to raise, during the present year, a sum of 750,000 dollars for the evangelization of the country.

The most memorable scene of the whole session, which lasted for ten days and was of interest, concerned in no small degree the delegation of English Congregationalists who were present. It was hardly possibly the body so enthusiastically loyal as a Congregational Council was sure to be, could be indifferent to any matter that should seem to concern the honour of our nation, or the sacredness of our recent cause. It happened accordingly when the committee appointed to reply to foreign delegations presented report, that no indistinct allusions were made to the lack of sympathy for the North which had appeared upon the part of many English Congregationalists. The debate which followed was as spirited and interesting as could be conceived. I will not attempt to reproduce it, or even to describe its quaint and citing features.

Its great interest for the purpose of this letter lay in the conclusion, when Rev. H. Ward Beecher, after having been loudly called for, came forward, and, after something more than consent to the criticism embodied in the report, which he balanced, however, by a generous recognition of the real and extensive sympathy which our cause had received in England, demanded, in the high strain of his characteristic eloquence, that henceforward there be a true unity and concert between the two great Protestant nations upon whose fidelity to the cause of Christ and of liberty the welfare of the world largely depends. In the midst of this glow of eloquence he walked to the edge of the platform, seized the hands of the British delegates, one of whom at least had, during the debate, been receiving somewhat less cordial treatment, and exclaimed, "I give the hand of fellowship and love to Old England." It opened all hearts, and healed all jealousies. The whole crowded assembly rose and shouted, and waved hats and handkerchiefs, and, with every demonstration of fervour and delight, consented that by-gones should be by-gones. In this matter, I think, American Christians will be satisfied to have Mr. Beecher and the Congregationalists speak for them all.

INCREASE OF ROMISH INFLUENCE.

The passage of a few months has done wonders in diverting our people from the feelings and interests which the war had excited. Nobody thinks it worth while now to utter his zeal for the punishment even of Mr. Davis. A few years of thrifty business promise to leave only a scar of the great wound by which the nation was so recently bleeding. But we must not be thought to flatter ourselves with the notion that because the civil war is successfully ended, all our national problems are satisfactorily solved. The ending of the rebellion is giving men leisure to think of the tremendous and growing power of Roman Catholicism in this country. The Catholic Church has by no means sympathised in the great work which the North has had to perform. Many of its members, indeed, have fought bravely on the side of the Union and of liberty; but it is perfectly plain that the Roman Catholics have had no interest in the abolishment of slavery. And it is to be expected that whatever effort may hereafter be made to embarrass the Government in its kind designs toward the negroes will receive the hearty and almost unanimous help of that numerous body. The Opposition, of course, will flatter and serve so important an ally. The Administration and its friends will be careful not to offend them; and so this immense power has all the conditions of daily growth. Protestant Christians have long seen and bewailed this state of things. Statesmen are beginning to see it; and there is at this moment, I think, a more anxious inquiry than has ever been made before, What can be done to check and resist the political power of the Romish hierarchy in America? The very question, if it become general, will go far toward providing an answer; for if the evil be fairly recognised there is ability enough to correct it. There are, however, one or two special sources of light upon this grave question. Our immense and increasing German population is, for the most part, far from friendly to the increase of a Roman Catholic influence among us. The Germans are in many respects our best immigrants. Thrifty, attached to home, intelligent, steadfast of purpose, they are the very material to be moulded into a democratic community. Those of them who bring a Protestant piety with them lack no element of good citizenship but knowledge of our institutions. And even that numerous class who are more or less tainted with infidelity, at least will not easily consent that the Romish priesthood shall dominate in the land.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody good." The Fenian movement, upon which your readers will not be apt to look with favour, is far more likely to shake the power of the Popish clergy here than the power of the British Government in Ireland. The clergy, as you know, unanimously take ground against it. Perhaps they think that matters are progressing well enough for their Church in Great Britain as it is. At least they know that a people seized with republican fervour is not far from rebellion against the Pope. "Look at Young Italy persecuting our Holy Father! Young Ireland would do the same." These sentences in a recent harangue of a priest in Trenton, New Jersey, show how the Catholic clergy dread the movement. But the love for meetings and speeches and cheap patriotism that is not expected to fight is so strong, that the Fenians do not disband, but increase; and the power of the priest is proportionally weakened.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

The prospect of any union among Protestant Churches that may offset the numbers and influence of the Catholic Church does not seem to be very definite. There has of late been a new attempt made in this direction. Bodies as respectable as the two Presbyterian Assemblies have endorsed it. But prudent second thoughts are not likely to encourage it. Opposition to Popery, or indeed to anything wrong, is the duty of every Christian man; but a formal alliance of churches under any such banner, even if it were possible, could not but degrade them. At the same time it is distinctly felt that the increase of confidence and good feeling among the different denominations of Protestant Christians would be a great gain not only to the cause of religion, but of the country. Under this conviction an effort is now making upon a liberal scale to set on foot a periodical to be devoted to the illustration of the practicability and desirableness of a real fellowship and concert among the Evangelical Churches. The friends of the measure are confident of its good results. I shall be able to speak more definitely of the undertaking when it shall be somewhat further advanced.

HIGH CHURCH TENDENCIES—BISHOP POTTER AND DR. TYNG.

I know of no new development in the dispute between Bishop Potter and some of his clergy. Dispute it is, for Dr. Tyng, pastor of the largest Episcopal congregation in New York, has published his reply to "a printed pamphlet purporting to be a pastoral letter to the clergy of the diocese of New York," in which he takes ground that a "pastoral letter" to the "clergy," is "extra-canonical, and becomes merely personal and didactic, and not only permits, but seems also to invite individual conference and response." In the response which he proceeds to make, he disputes the Bishop's law, sustains his own different interpretation by the usage of the Episcopal Church in England and America, and has the characteristic frankness to say: "The coming history can only be a repetition of the past. We can never concede the exclusive interpretation which your letter appears to claim for alleged law upon this subject. The forcing of your views, as you seem to intimate by the capital letters on your eighth page, can only result in dividing the church, destroying much fruit of the ministry therein, driving valuable ministers therefrom, or constraining into a selfish hypocrisy for bread those whom power may have the opportunity to oppress and whose earthly condition is without a comforter. That any circumstances should be found sufficiently constraining to lead to this course, or that any courts should be found sufficiently partisan and blind to sustain such a system of wholesale excision from the church, I can only believe when the facts shall give their indubitable demonstration. You will pardon me for this freedom of speech. But Bishop Hobart* was not willing to carry out the practical logic of principles, though he openly threatened bringing them to their test in preventing Bishop Meade's consecration; and Bishop Ravecroft urged him to exercise them in the punishment of Dr. Milner. We can only say: now, what we have been compelled always to say: superior power can have our places, but no earthly power can have our principles. After describing the liberty which he has always exercised in receiving occasional services in his congregation from non-Episcopal divines, and in using or dispensing with the Prayer-book when preaching to other than Episcopal congregations, he says: "To change this practice, and silence this universal freedom, is beyond the power or the right of Episcopal authority."

A short note prefaced to this spirited letter (of twenty octavo pages) says that it is printed at the unanimous request of the Clerical Association of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Bishop's pastoral, therefore, does not seem to have reduced his clerical flock to the attitude of submission. It remains to be seen how the shepherd and the sheep can now fully come together.

ELECTIONS TO CONVOCATION.

Convocation, it is well known, is co-existent with Parliament—the old one is dissolved and a new one summoned simultaneously with the writ for the dissolution and re-election of the House of Commons. Like that body, too, the Lower House of Convocation is elected by the clergy of the various dioceses, while the spiritual Peers, like their temporal brethren, are subjected to no such chance of exclusion. But the elections of the Lower House of Convocation differ very materially from the election of the House of Commons. In the first place, there is an important portion of the House that is not subjected to the contingencies of an election at all; every Dean and every Archdeacon being a member of Convocation in right of his office. It might be thought this was sufficient recognition of the importance of the position of the dignified clergy; but not content with this, it is arranged that the Dean and Chapter in every diocese shall also select a proctor to represent them; and, as the prebendaries and non-residentary canons are not allowed to have any voice in the affairs of Convocation, and as many canons find their way to Convocation through other channels, it follows that the election of the capitular portion is little more than a form. The only semblance of popular feeling in these elections is to be found in the meetings of the clergy of the various archdeaconries for the choice of their proctors; and here, too, various and glaring anomalies may be found. To begin with the diocese of London, which is divided into the two archdeaconries of London and Middlesex. It is the custom for the clergy in each archdeaconry to meet and elect two proctors. The four are then sent up to the Bishop, who, in the exercise of his discretion, selects the two who are to represent the diocese; always, or almost always, taking care to select one from each archdeaconry. This arrangement chafed sorely against the feelings of the clergy of London at the recent election, and much discussion took place as to the best mode of altering it; but something of the kind is common to all the dioceses, and a plan for the reform of Convocation is one of the great questions of the day. In the diocese of Lichfield there are three archdeaconries, each of which meets and elects two proctors. The six clergymen thus chosen subsequently meet together and determine which two of them shall be sent to Convocation. In the dioceses of Oxford and Lincoln the meetings were presided over by their respective Bishops, which is said to be an innovation on the ancient practice; and in the case of the former diocese the Bishop was accompanied to the meeting by Emma, the Dowager Queen of the Sandwich Islands, who was then on a visit at Cuddesdon; this being probably the first time that ever a lady attended at a clerical election meeting.

At all the meetings the revival of Convocation appeared to be considered as a settled fact. The feeling is not universal, indeed; for the Rev. Canon M'Neile, who had formerly been a member of the Northern Convocation, wrote to his constituents, declining to be re-elected on the following grounds:—

Therecently-published correspondence between the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir George Grey has, I think, made it abundantly clear that Convocation can act only conformably to the common and statute law, including therein the rubrics and formularies of the Church; in other words, that Convocation can act only where no further action is required; and that it has, and can have, no license to make any specific alterations. Any alterations propounded by it must be submitted to the Queen, who may allow and ratify, or disallow, annihilate, and make void the whole or any part thereof. This being the case, it seems to me more dignified to accept the position in silence than to go through the empty formality of proposing resolutions and conducting debates which are felt by the country and by the Church to be nothing but talk.

We have already alluded to the dissatisfaction existing among the metropolitan clergy with the fractional part in Convocation that is allotted to them. The London archdeaconry put two candidates in nomination, the Rev. Michael Gibbs and the Rev. Wm. Scott; and both were, as a matter of course, declared duly elected. The Middlesex clergy put three in nomination, all new men, for the Rev. Mr. Baker, of Fulham, the proctor in last Convocation, had retired. The clergymen nominated were the Rev. J. E. Kemp, of St. James; the Rev. Mr. Mayow, of West Brompton; and the Rev. Canon Boyd, of Paddington;—the special claims of this last gentleman being that, as an Irishman, he would maintain in Convocation the rights of the Irish Church. But this recommendation did not appear to find much favour in the eyes of his metropolitan brethren; for when the vote was called he was lowest on the poll. The names of the four elected proctors have been since presented to the Bishop, who has nominated to serve in Convocation Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Kemp. The former sat in last Convocation; the latter had the largest number of votes. The elections in the other dioceses do not call for special remark. Generally, it may be said that wherever a member of the old Convocation was willing to be returned, his claim was admitted by his brethren. The subjects that were most discussed at the meetings were, the Court of Appeal, the Judgment of Convocation on Essays and Reviews, and on Dr. Colenso, and the reform of Convocation itself.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON AND RITUALISM.

Since the speech of the Bishop of London in the House of Lords, deprecating the extreme ritualism which has of late found a place in certain churches of his diocese, and promising to endeavour to restrain it within proper limits, great alarm has been felt by the ritualistic promoters. The columns of the Tractarian journals have been filled with intemperate attacks on the Bishop, sometimes by way of letters from clerical correspondents, sometimes by editorial articles; and the English Church Union has prepared a memorial—we have not heard how it has been signed—addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, protesting against any restriction of the present extent to which the law allows ritual to be carried, and insisting that the regulation of these matters lies in Convocation alone, not in the Crown or in Parliament. The Bishop himself has not been altogether idle in the matter of the promise he made in the House of Lords. At a meeting of the archdeacons and rural deans of the diocese, held at Fulham Palace by his lordship's invitation the other day, the means were discussed by which the tendency to excessive ritualism in so many quarters may be restricted. We do not learn from the report communicated to the journals that any practical step was resolved upon. The truth is, that the task is more difficult than is generally supposed. According to the rubric, all such usages and ornaments in churches are to be allowed as were in use in the reign of Edward VI.; and the ritualists have not been slack in hunting out all the vain and superstitious usages which were in any quarter tolerated at that time, and insist on adopting them now. From this position they can only be driven by an Act of Parliament; and any attempt to procure an Act of Parliament on this subject might have a tendency to disturb more questions than it settled.

DR. COLENZO.

Dr. Colenso issued from the press, a few weeks ago, the fifth volume of his "Critical Examination of the Books of Moses and Joshua," and in his preface he announced that he was about immediately to return to his diocese in South Africa. That intention he has since carried into effect, and he is now on his voyage. We believe this last instalment of his attack upon the Old Testament, like all his former ones except the first, has fallen still-born from the press. The small profits, or rather the certain loss, resulting from the publication of these latter volumes may help to explain the necessity for the subscription that was raised among his admirers, "partly to relieve him from the position in which he was placed by the withholding of his episcopal income, and partly also to testify to the services rendered by him to the cause of free expression of opinion within the Church of England." That subscription amounted to 3,330*l*. In his reply to the contributors, thanking them for their donations, the Bishop complained strongly of the conduct of the Trustees and Council of the Colonial Bishops' Fund in continuing to withhold the arrears of his salary after the decision of the Judicial Committee of Council. They had compelled him to resort to fresh litigation in order to obtain his arrears, and though he had filed his bill in Chancery on the 5th of May, yet on the 26th of July they were still asking for further time to reply to it:—

He hardly required to say that, but for the generous aid of those present, and his old friends, at that critical moment, the very debt itself would have crushed him. He had patiently borne the twelve months' unavoidable suspension of income pending the judgment of the Privy Council, but he would frankly own that his own resources could not much longer have maintained the struggle. He was obliged, therefore, to say to his personal friends, "I am now to be engaged in another protracted litigation, I must turn my thoughts at once to some other means of livelihood, and forego the thought of returning again to Natal." The solution of his difficulty was the solution of his difficulty. They had made it possible for him to return to his diocese.

As to the resolution which his clergy have come to, not to render him canonical obedience in case of his coming again among them, the Bishop appeared to make very little of it. He disputed the statements which he appeared on the subject altogether.

It is well known that Bishop Gray of Cape Town has announced his determination to excommunicate Dr. Colenso, if he should attempt to resume episcopal functions in his diocese, and there is no reason to doubt that he will keep his word. It seems equally certain that Bishop Colenso, with his view, will treat this fulmination with contempt; he does not make it the ground of another action against his Metropolitan. But the proceedings will involve the unhappy Church in South Africa in endless complications.

COMPREHENSION OF DISSENTERS IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

It appears that some months ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the invitation of the Rev. Newman Hall, met at the house of the latter a small party of gentlemen, consisting chiefly of leading Dissenting ministers and spent an evening in conversation on some of the practical questions at issue between Churchmen and Nonconformists. The Rev. Dr. Vaughan was the principal speaker on behalf of his brethren. The Rev. H. Christopher, minister of New College Congregational Chapel, St. John's-wood, was one of the company, but did not take any active part in the discussion. The following correspondence occurred shortly afterwards. Wm. Gladstone had ceased to represent the University of Oxford, Mr. Christopher asked and obtained permission to give it to the public:—

THE REV. H. CHRISTOPHERSON TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

Sir,—I had the pleasure, on Tuesday evening of joining the small company of gentlemen at the house of my friend Mr. Newman Hall, who you honoured with a visit, and with whom and his guests you held a conference on certain ecclesiastical questions. I took but a slight hare in that discussion, partly because the views which I entertain upon the chief topic then in and would have placed me in a minority, and could probably have occasioned some controversy amongst ourselves, whereas the object before us was an interchange of opinions between our distinguished visitor and the general company then present. But I was also influenced by allowing sentiments to pass with which I differed, by recollecting that they were the sentiments of my seniors, and of men who cherished them with a strong but honourable jealousy. At the same time, I beg to be allowed the liberty of assuring you, in this more private way, that there is, to my certain knowledge, a very large amount of opinion among Nonconformists and among Nonconformist ministers, of which the general character of the remarks made to you on Tuesday is not a complete expression. I fully admit that the opponents of "Establishments" would be found in a majority, doubtless in a very large majority, among Dissenters, if opinions could be collected and compared. But I entirely demur to the statement of Dr. Vaughan (certainly made from his sincere conviction), that the adversaries of all connexion between "Church" and "State," in the ranks of Nonconformists are, to the remnant, as fifty to one. I am the minister of a congregation in this suburb, which is composed of men of various complexions of creed on this subject, and I have the means of knowing many congregations beside my own; and my firm belief is, that there is an influential section of Nonconformists with whom an Establishment is not the barrier in the way of conformity—that many Dissenters prefer some recognition of religion by the "State" (quod a "State")—that a large number, whilst discerning the evils of "Establishments," believe the mischiefs to be nearly as great in unendowed Churches, so that there is an almost even choice of defects—but that a larger number still are indifferent altogether on that part of the question.

Why are they, then, Dissenters? They are Dissenters on the ground of the present rate of Subscription; and my chief reason for troubling you with this note is to assure you of that fact; because if you carry away from our conference an opposite impression, it is plain that the weight of your immense authority on the side of Liturgical Reform, or relaxation of Subscription, will probably be withheld. If I recollect accurately, you expressed an opinion that no important section in the Church of England even entertained the idea of a separation between "Church and State." If, therefore, you should be misled into the conclusion that no relief would be valued by any considerable party among Dissenters short of the entire disendowment of religion, you would consider any action towards such relief wasted energy. Now, I submit that on a great question like this, statesmen should learn even the judgments of minorities, and I am one of those who agree with the dictum uttered, I think, by Mr. Isaac Taylor, that "half a dip of ink would reconcile hundreds of Nonconformists to the Established Church."

Without further trespassing on your time (although it would gratify me much to be able to proceed from assertion to demonstration), I beg permission to affirm that multitudes of men who would be acquisitions to the strength of the Church of England remain outside her borders, because, like myself, they cannot strain their charity to the full extent of the service for the "Burial of the Dead;" they cannot sanction, even in words, the opus operatum of the "Baptismal Office"—they cannot claim co-ordinate authority with the apostles in the "Order for the Visitation of the Sick"—they cannot offend their notions of modern decorum and decency in the office for the "Solemnisation of Matrimony;" and lastly (and pardon the egotism if I say that this last is the cardinal hindrance which bars my own admission to your venerable section of the one Church), they cannot consign to everlasting damnation, so far as their creed could do it, all the victims of a doubt on the transcendentalism, the microscopical transcendentalism I had almost said, of the Athanasian Creed. I am a firm believer in the doctrines intended to be avowed in that confession of faith; but I would rather starve in the cold shade of Nonconformity than declare as a parish priest, several times in the year, that "except a man believe as I believe, on the subject of the Trinity," "he shall, without doubt, perish everlastingly."

In fine, permit me to assure you that whilst, no doubt, the thousands of Dissenters are Dissenters chiefly through a love of liberty as well as of truth, there are hundreds of Dissenters besides those, who, though not mean enough to undervalue liberty, find their truest ideals of liberty in the farthest remove from a religious republic, men who remain Dissenters by a stern compulsion through a love of truth and charity, and men who would sacrifice speculative dogma on Church government, and even surrender some personal freedom, to avoid the calamities of religious strife, could they only be delivered by a second Reformation from burdens which neither they nor their fathers have been able to bear.

Sir, I have the honour to be, with the highest respect, your very faithful servant,

HENRY CHRISTOPHERSON.

The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.

MR. GLADSTONE TO THE REV. H. CHRISTOPHERSON.

11, Carlton-terrace.

Dear Sir,—I have read your letter with great interest; but I am doubtful whether it opens any wider ground of co-operation than the conversation of last Tuesday evening appeared to open.

In 1689, when it was proposed to reform the Common Prayer Book by expunging some of its distinctive features, the scheme was abandoned, and I apprehend for no other reason than this: that it was found that the plan of comprehension, to which very high authorities, including Archbishop Sancroft, were in principle more or less favourable, was so distasteful to a great part of the members of the Church, that either it could not be carried, or, if carried, it would eject many more than it would admit. This was, I think, if true, a just and a conclusive objection. It is, I confess, my belief that the same result would follow now.

It is probably true that a smaller proportion of the members of the Church of England are keenly attached, at this period, to what may be called roughly her distinctive features, than were so attached in 1689; but, on the other hand, there is much more alarm about extended changes, embracing other views and aims than yours. Nor is it to be denied that, among the members of the Church of England, there is a very prevalent sentiment of profound thankfulness for the Prayer Book as a whole, which indisposes them to consider critically what any of them might in the abstract take to be defects (and probably the defect in the eyes of one would be a virtue in the judgment of another), and which, combined with a conviction of the real difficulty of the business, very greatly deadens any wish in the direction of change.

There is no doubt that the view you describe is practically in rather sharp antagonism with that stated by Dr. Vaughan. Let us consider the effects of the two on the opposing power. Many a Churchman would deal liberally in questions of admission to equality of all civil, social, or educational privilege, who not only would resist attempts to alter the Church itself, with a view to comprehension, but would, from fear of this latter object, become jealous of all concessions appertaining to the former. I do not speak of my opinions or predilections in this matter, because I have no more right to the enjoyment of the national establishment of religion, as such, than any other subject of the Queen. And if it can be shown that a change would enlarge and strengthen the Church on the whole, I should admit at once the justice of that change, however unfavourably it might affect myself.

But the time is evidently unfavourable for grappling, on any footing, with the broader questions—and, as far as I may presume to have an opinion, the wisest plan for all parties is to be content with what may be at the moment practicable, not forfeiting any right nor renouncing any hope, but limiting the work of the moment to the capabilities of the moment, and striving to do small perhaps, but solid good. If the good be real, it will always tend, in the end, to beget more good.

Such remarks as these, so freely, and at the same time so roughly expressed, will require, I am confident, all your indulgence. Indeed, I can well conceive that no amount of indulgence would suffice, if they were to be tried by rigid and abstract rules. But my opposition has for many years been a rather peculiar one, placing me in contact with very extended varieties of opinion in affairs like these, and this, perhaps, is the origin to which the tone and colour of my thought ought to be referred.—I remain, reverend and dear Sir, your very obedient and faithful,

W. E. GLADSTONE.

The Rev. H. Christopherson.

WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE.

The Conference of Wesleyan Methodist ministers, which met this year in Birmingham, was the 122nd annual assembly of the successors of John Wesley, reckoning from the first Conference, which took place at the Old Foundry, Moorfields, in 1744, when he and his brother Charles, with four other clergymen, were six out of the ten persons who met together. The Rev. W. Shaw was elected President, and the Rev. John Farrar,

Secretary. The new President's early ministerial life was passed as a missionary South Africa, and he is described by Watchman as the Apostle of the Kaffirs. He was not only the founder of a mission, was for nearly thirty years "the chief of Colonial Methodism in Southern Africa as well the director of the missions to the Kaffir tribes. He was the General Superintendent i.e., the Patriarch or Archbishop (if we were to adopt the higher ecclesiastical phraseology)—of all the Methodist churches of South Africa, whether among the Colonists Kaffirs. Something like thirty years ago he paid a visit to his own country, and took English circuit. He was at that time, then a young man and a missionary soon to return to his foreign field, chosen by his brethren into the ranks of the Legal Hundred."

The proceedings of the Conference were preceded, as usual, by those of the preparatory committees, in which laymen took part. These were well attended. The Journal already quoted says: "There can be no doubt that the measure adopted a year ago by the Conference, in virtue of which a layman from every district is required to attend the several committees of review has operated very beneficially; and that has helped to establish a living sympathy between the central administration of Methodism and every province included within its territory. Each committee presented special points of interest. Sunday and Day-schools, the Chapel Department, Home Missions, Foreign Missions, the provision for maintaining and educating the children of ministers, the great and pressing question of the Theological Institution—all these primary matters were represented at the various committees."

It was reported that there are now in the Connexion 4,986 Sunday-schools, attended by 537,311 scholars, being an increase of 4,792 scholars; of the scholars, 29,356 are members of Society. The number of day-schools is 579, being an increase of 17,8 containing 88,525 scholars, which is an increase of 6,192. The disparity between the number of day and of Sunday-schools is still enormously great, although it diminishes slightly year by year. The total annual cost of the day-schools is 66,902*l*. The Rev. Clulow, appointed by the last Conference to inspect and report on the condition of the Wesleyan Sunday-schools, and by whom the report was read, was re-appointed for the ensuing year.

In the Chapel Department it was stated the amount of work accomplished last year in the department of chapel-building was that of any former year. The total of the undertakings completed during the year has been 206,329, which is an increase of 92,000% more than last year, and 1% more than in the highest former year.

These undertakings include 124 new churches, 55 enlargements, and 12 schools, and 3 organs.

It appeared that there has been promised to the Missionary Jubilee Fund £227,000, or about £200,000. Of this total, about £108,000 has been paid. The subscriptions were undertaken to extend over three years. Sums were distributed for the following purposes: The support of a college for the training of missionary students; the relief of the distressed trustees in the West Indies, with a view to the missions becoming self-supporting; the payment of money for the support of superannuated missionaries; and of the widows and orphans of missionaries; the erection of a chapel at Lausanne, memorial of John Wesley, and towards the missions in Italy, France, and India.

In connexion with the Home Mission and Agent Fund, it was reported that while the missionaries were appointed by the year Conference in 1857, there were 72 chaplains, in addition to eight ministers appointed to the charge of Wesleyan soldiers in the Army. Since 1859 fifteen home missions have, in consequence of the war, been incorporated with circuits, and chapels in consequence been built. The same this year in circuits where home missionaries are labouring is 1,389 members of society, and amounted last year to 20,000. It is quite insufficient to accomplish the work contemplated. On the subject of chaplains a conversation took place, turning on a desirability of securing Government grants for the support of Methodist chaplains in the Army. The work has not been supported from the Home Mission Fund, and it was generally admitted that the relations between the Government and the Home Mission Committee are of so satisfactory a character, that it is desirable to settle the matter with the committee.

At the proceedings a resolution was passed by Dr. Hannah, seconded by Rev. J. W. Jones, and supported by Rev. W. Arthur, expressing his sense of the beauty of the late President's character, the value of his services, and the sorrow of the Conference for his death. Mr. Arthur said it was the first time any man had ever died President of three Conferences.

There were about 140 candidates for the ministry, all of whom had undergone preliminary examinations. The cases of all were reviewed by the Conference, and about thirty candidates were declined. Those who were accepted were ordained by the President and other ministers, at a public service, Bishop Janes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, taking part in the ordination.

A long and serious discussion took place upon reading the report of the number of members. It appears that there are 19,091 on trial, 18,793 new members have been received during the year; there have been 5,557 deaths; there are 330,827 members in Great Britain; 283 circuits have an increase, and 284 a decrease. The total increase is 1,174. After the reading of these figures, the Conference was addressed by the Revs. Dr. Osborn, Dr. Rigg, S. R. Hall, D. Hay, J. Tindale, and others, and the state of all the departments of Methodism came under review. "Why have we not greater success?" says the Methodist Recorder, "was the question to which a hundred answers were given by a score of men. Inefficient leaders, numerous removals, lack of pastoral care, the want in some cases of point and directness in preaching, the peculiar circumstances of some districts, and many other reasons, partially account for it. But the Conference was fully prepared to adopt the view of Dr. Osborn, that there was nothing in the altered circumstances of the age, and nothing in the present method of working Methodism, which could explain and justify this temporary stagnation. Bringing forward an old volume of the minutes, the Ex-President showed, from Wesley's own words, that a precisely similar state of things existed in his day, and, reading one by one the advices which Wesley gave in order to the 'promotion and extension of the work of God,' he showed how these were applicable still, a hundred years after the conjuncture they were intended to meet: 'We don't want anything new; attend to every part of the work; don't neglect any one of the old-fashioned means of grace; cherish Society meetings, love-feasts, and the Spirit, which alone can make even these methods of working mighty; and we shall not lack success.' This was the gist of that very remarkable speech; one which produced so great an impression that it was unanimously resolved at once to close the conversation."

The native church in connexion with the Free Church mission self-sustaining. Dr. Mullens mentions that at the principal of the city the people are advancing in the same direction, owing to pastor. "For a long series of years," writes Dr. Mullens, "they towards the simplest elements of their own worship, chapel re society bought the very mats on which they sat in church. All t

From Nagpore there are reported, by the Free Church baptisms; from Nusserabad, by the United Presbyterians, the hopeful convert of the merchant caste; and from the Nallur dist Church missionaries, the conversion of a family, the first-fruits of province, whose father has been baptized with his two younger cl convert, Jagannath (lord of the world), a youth of fifteen, who l a-half under the care of the missionaries, is spoken of as having u nation of character. Till about a year ago, we are told, perhaps of his character were indolence and timidity. Now, his whole nat noble activity, while his former timidity and fear of observation a endurance. This latter feature of his character was well illustrat up a marriage agreement into which his father had entered abot behalf. The Rev. Wm. Martin, by whom he was baptized, says :-

The guardians of his intended bride, having learned that he was l and was being rapidly perverted, sent a deputation to bring him witl several days the deputation plied him with every kind of message, var derness and the most withering denunciations; but still the boy remai the father alone came to the bungalow, and tried to shake his resolution; along with him the deputation, who, as a last resource, besought me t bungalow. I answered, "He is before you. If he chooses to go, he n rity over him. He is now of age to speak and judge for himself. Y money to have this case prosecuted in a court of law, and have him authority. I give you a friend's advice: let law alone. The judge can decision, whether he shall go or stay, and you may have that from his ov Jagannath to explain his reasons for not wishing to get married, and for mission compound instead of anywhere else. He who for the past ho shrink out of sight in the corner of the room, now summoned an amoi could hardly have conceived as possible, and addressed his father, as ne the following terms: "You are my father, and I never was so anxious a you, and I hope you will not lessen my respect by trying to compel o which is opposed to the will of God. Since coming here I have got: am too young to marry; and although it were my desire, I have got n wife. Although not yet baptized, I am a Christian in heart, and ca Christian woman. The girl may be very good, and may make a good get married, you had better secure another husband for her! As for lea do so, unless sahib sends me away. It is here my eyes have been part of the country than that of the other members of their little church—"the long unproductive pettah of Mysore."

CHINA.

From Tien-tsin to the capital of the province of Peche-li, in the almost unexplored interior of China, has been traversed by the Rev. Messrs. Lees and Hall, of the London Society, accompanied by a native teacher, in the prosecution of a missionary tour. Their journal describes the opportunities they obtained of opening the Gospel message in new regions, the novel and picturesque scenes they witnessed, and the enormous population through which they passed. In one case, they reached a country market, and wishing to preach, says Mr. Lees—

A good-tempered fellow led us to a quiet spot, and we began our work, our friend planting himself by my knees and keeping order. We greatly enjoyed the simple kindness of the people, and they were many of them plainly much interested. Hall told me after that more than one quite understood the great truths proclaimed. They have a habit of saying "Hau hwa, hau hwa" (good words), when anything is said which pleases them; and this was uttered to-day at times and in a way which showed that it was not mere politeness. A crowd followed us to the boat. No missionary, they said, had ever visited them before, nor had any books reached the village.

At Sheng-fang also, a town of some 40,000 inhabitants, the people told them it was the first time that they had heard the "strange foreign doctrine." Here the missionaries write :—

Our boat was hardly anchored before a scene began which was new in our experience. It was not without difficulty that Chang and I got ashore. We were at once besieged for the books we carried. Making our way across the bridge, I pushed into a temple yard, but the crush was so great that I had to ask a man to guide us to some larger space. He found us a capital stand, and made himself very useful. I told them the story of Jesus raising the widow's son. There is a wonderful power in these "Bible stories." Latterly I have been much struck with this. One may preach away most earnestly and plainly, illustrating as best we can, and all in vain; but the moment some incident from the Gospels is told, and the lessons taught by it naturally drawn, every eye is fixed.

Preaching over, the missionaries asked for the reading men, in order to give them books :—

For a moment all went well; but soon the eagerness of the people broke all bounds, and I found it needful to announce that we would give no more: they must buy. At once fifty hands were outstretched; and, for fear lest others should forestall them, there was a rush forward on the part of each to snatch them from us. Again and again we implored them to be patient. More than once, by main force, I pushed back those who crowded up the temple steps. All to no purpose. There was nothing for us but to beat a retreat. We made for our boat; but not to rest. The people, young and old, followed us; and for upwards of three hours there was a scene of the most exciting interest. Over a thousand must have visited us. Kept constantly supplied with books by Mr. Hall [who was an invalid], who most of the time remained inside out of the turmoil, and with the boatmen and others trying to keep order, it was still more than I could do to supply the demand. Many a time, in sheer self-defence, I had to clear the boat; for they swarmed upon it like bees, and some poor lads got ducked repeatedly, but, nothing daunted, their cash was the next minute once more presented, and they got one book only to return the succeeding minute for another. The men on shore, except when they wished a forty-cash testament, trusted all to these nimble messengers. Soon the bank presented an extraordinary appearance. It was a gradual slope of considerable height, and crowded from top to bottom with natives. I was too busy to notice much, but Hall speaks of it as the most wonderful thing he has seen in China. Many were supplied with books; and these were being opened and read with eager curiosity. Numbers more were, with outstretched hands, demanding the coveted treasure. The perspiration ran down my face. I begged for rest. They crowded round the open window. I expostulated, got angry. No; books they wanted, and books they would have. We resolved to drop down the river. As we took up the anchor half-a-dozen fell into the water. No matter, they followed us down the bank. We crossed, and shut up shop for awhile, leaving Chang to preach while we had a quiet stroll. They pressed us with questions and entreaties for books. We soon found there was no rest for us at Sheng-fang. It was close on seven o'clock, and I was worn out. I began to fear, too, that the excitement would be too much for Brother Hall. So we resolved to go. Before leaving, however, I mounted a high grave-mound, and preached again. There must have been 500 present. They were as attentive as before. We now said "Good-bye." When a mile from the town, scores still lined the bank, crying, "Don't go, don't go! let me have one book. See, here is money: only one!" We thought to supply just these, and pass on. No sooner had we pulled to one bank than those on the opposite one pulled off their clothes, and, holding them upon their heads with one hand, while the other contained their money, plunged into the water towards us. As soon as it was known we had stopped, the stream again began to pour from the town. We once more pulled up anchor; but some poor fellows followed the boat for two miles, until their pleadings proved successful.

A Directory of Protestant Missionaries in China has just been published, from which it appears that there were actually in the field, on the 20th March last, no less than 187 and the Lord's Supper was administered there for the first time. Group stalwart natives, clad in their red blankets, marched into the church but until, we are told, the little building was filled to suffocation by the Red missionaries writes :—

I cannot help contrasting what was that day seen, heard, and done, with moral desolation which presented itself a year ago in this region. Twelve months ago no sound heard was the wild song of the dance and the heathen shout of mirth was no preacher, no Sabbath observance, no sound of melody and praise to God. What a contrast ! Sabbath-day and week-day the temple of prayer is open, and we hear the story of redeeming love. Every day the children are taught to read and sing, and the sound of thanksgiving and adoration is echoed by these rocks, which only a few years ago were the wildest yells and savage outbursts of joy and mirth.

A few days ago, after the baptism at Thomas River, four conveyed to another station—that of the Umgwali.

MADAGASCAR.

The Bishop of Mauritius writes cheeringly of the progress and prosperity of the London Society's mission in Madagascar. In reference to the Society's work on the island, the Bishop says : " Their beginnings have indeed been thus far encouraging : both Mr. Hey and Mr. Holding show some of the missionary character. Four additional men could be employed at once after training here."

In our earlier pages will be found extracts from the interesting journal of R. Maundrell, of the Church Missionary Society. It relates, among other things, of the baptism of the secretary to the Governor of Vohimare.

The Rev. Mr. Ellis writes encouragingly of the progress of the London Society in the distant frontier villages, in opposite directions, there arrives, sometimes by sea, a letter, informing the missionaries of little companies of Christians who were before unknown to them. Mr. Ellis adds :—

It is also a source of great satisfaction to us, and encouragement in our work, to see the friendly relations with our brethren the missionaries of the Church who are labouring in Madagascar to promote the same great work. I hope we shall only in heart, but in using the same educational works in our respective spheres, and preaching the same Saviour to the different races of the Malagasy by which we are surrounded.

Two or three of the missionaries of the London Society have, unfortunately, been in collision with the authorities. During the Queen's absence from the city, erected at the principal entrances to the city, which no persons are allowed to enter without giving their names. The missionaries in question refused to do so, and were arrested. These sentries were punished, the missionaries were released, and the British consul was satisfied. But at home there has followed not one of them, with the exception of the Prince, her husband, appears to be truly converted ; and among the boys, especially, there is some lack of order. The church, without being anything remarkable, gives me satisfaction and very little trouble. There is a considerable increase in their numbers. Our place of worship is large, well situated, and built of wood. It also serves as a school. Near this edifice is a place where for thirty years and more a Protestant school was held. Shortly before my arrival Catholic influence succeeded in suppressing it. The building was simply taken and placed within the enclosure belonging to the Sisters of Charity, and there it is still used by them. Prudence prevented me from making an immediate protest. I did so, however, as soon as we had got a footing. Useless trouble ; we were regarded as too ambitious ! And besides, the site of the school was, according to the plan of the town, to become a public square, and have a fountain. A new Governor came. I saw him. He understood me, and said at my first interview with him, "Can I do anything for you ?" Without loss of time I took him a formal request. The very next day I had a favourable answer ; he granted the spot I asked for, and added besides 2,000fr. for the erection of two large school-rooms. I opened a subscription forthwith. Two English merchants subscribed 1,000fr. each, and your humble servant 500fr. It is absolutely necessary to make a generous effort, so do not be astonished, my old and kind friend, if I have taken a great liberty with you, and put your name down for 1,000fr., which you will, I doubt not, send to M. Casalis, Secretary of the French Missionary Society, Paris. I think we want two rooms, each capable of holding 150 children. How shall we get the money without an effort ?

Symbols of Christ. By CHARLES STANFORD. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

Sermons Preached at Union Chapel, King's Lynn, by the late Rev. E. L. Hull, B.A. Nisbet.

MR. STANFORD'S work consists of twelve sermons, each devoted to the elucidation of some principal type or symbol of Him in whom all the shadows and emblems of the patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations found their substance and reality. The selection is somewhat varied, and thus brings under notice a large amount of Scriptural truth, on subjects of the most vital importance. Some of the topics are derived from Old Testament history, these being "The Royal Priest of Salem," the "Angel in the Burning Bush," and the "Captain of the Lord's Host ;" others from the prophetic utterances of inspiration, which predicted the advent of "Shiloh," of the "Teacher of the Weary" (Isaiah l. 2-4), and of the "Refiner Watching the Crucible ;" two—the "Shepherd of Souls," and the "Awakener"—are from the Psalms ; while of the rest, the texts, with one exception, are supplied by the Gospels. These last comprise "The Healer" (Luke viii. 45) ; "The Master of Life" (Luke viii. 49) ; "The Wings of the Shekinah" (Matthew xxiii. 37) ; and "The Advocate in the Court of Mercy" (1 John ii. 1). In one of these, it may be noticed, that while the text is from the New Testament, the title of the discourse is from the Old. The idea will be seen to be substantially the same in both ; but this illustrates one characteristic excellence, as we venture to think, of our author's method. He never so confines himself to his text as to forget that after all that human ingenuity and learning can do to bring out the true meaning of Scripture, he is its best interpreter who seeks to make it interpret itself. And this is done not in the bald, uninviting, and irksome manner we meet with in some theological treatises we might mention, but in such a way as invariably to sustain attention, and for the most part to awaken renewed interest. Mr. Stanford, while showing that he is no inattentive observer of men and things, and gathering wisdom from ancient and modern writers of every class, is evidently, above all, a reverent student of the Bible. Hence not only the constant appeal to the Written Word with which we meet in his pages, but the absence of fanciful speculations and theological novelties. He concerns himself almost exclusively with those great verities which from age to age have sustained the spiritual life of the Church, as they centre around the person and work of our Lord, unfolding their significance and showing their adaptation to the varying needs of human nature. The book is less fitted for the man of the world than for the Christian, though even the former could scarcely fail to be struck with the beauty of the style. To the latter, cherished and familiar truths are presented in a great variety of aspects and with much richness of colouring, and the old words often seem to glow with fresh life. Sometimes, indeed, we cannot help deeming the style too ornate ; but Mr. Stanford will not fail to find readers who will be of a different opinion.

The volume bearing Mr. Hull's name, although not printed now for the first time, is posthumous. It comprises thirty sermons, of which twenty-two were printed for private circulation. This unpublished edition was well received ; after it was exhausted the demand continued ; and hence the present issue. None of these sermons were revised by the author for the press, and some are from short-hand notes taken during delivery. Some are therefore very brief, and all appear somewhat unfinished. The volume is, in respect of style, in complete contrast to that of Mr. Stanford ;

but the vital truths which it inculcates are the same. Clear reasoning, and powerful thought, expressed in the simplest language, and leaving the impression that the preacher has far from exhausted his theme, make these sermons very suggestive and valuable. Mr. Hull's discourses may be read with advantage by preachers as well as hearers.

The Handbook of English Literature. By JOSEPH ANGUS, M.A., D.D. The Religious Tract Society.

THE aim of Dr. Angus, in this work, is, as he tells us, to give a photograph of our literature with sufficient minuteness of detail to supply the curious inquirer with facts that may serve his purpose or guide him to further inquiry, and with such fulness and breadth of treatment of the more important eras and writers—the great centres of literary influence—as shall secure a vivid and just conception of the whole. With this view, after devoting a chapter to Anglo-Saxon, another to Anglo-Norman literature, and a third to the English language, he discards the strictly chronological plan which has been followed by his predecessors, and gives a view of each branch of literature in a separate division of his work. We have thus brought under notice, in uninterrupted succession, the English poets from Chaucer to Montgomery. The dramatists, in like manner, are treated together. This leaves the prose writers to be dealt with apart from the rest, according to the class to which their works belong—history, theology, philosophy, or general literature—a special chapter being devoted to the novelists. The work is so arranged, however, that by reference to tables supplied for the purpose, it may be read in centuries, reigns, or literary periods. Of the execution of the work, it may suffice to say that it is worthy of the high reputation of the author, and his position as Examiner in English Language, Literature, and History to the University of London. There may be those who may question the propriety of the issue of a work of this kind by the Religious Tract Society. Let such objectors point, if they can, to any other book in which the entire range of English authorship, living writers excepted, is reviewed from the same stand-point—that of Evangelical Christianity. We may sometimes differ to a certain extent from Dr. Angus's estimate of a particular writer, and of the moral tendency of his works; but our ultimate standard of ethical criticism being the same, the divergence between us can hardly be a wide one, and where we do not follow him, we can securely trust to his arriving at a substantially sound judgment. In fine, valuable as have been the preceding educational works of the Tract Society, we deem this, in some important respects, the best of all. It supplies a desideratum, and should obtain wide acceptance as a class-book and a manual for private study.

Commentary on the Gospel of St. John. By HENGSTENBERG, D.D. Translated from German. Vol. I. Edinburgh: J. and J. C.

THE selection of books for Clark's Foreignological Library has for some time past exceedingly good. The volume before us is well fitted to be useful. The name of it is a guarantee for learning, piety, and orthodoxy as well as for other high qualities. This edition promises to fill a gap in our literature the very time when such a work is so wanted. The admirable depth and spirituality of the fourth Gospel have been the theme of many in all ages; but of late certain critics in France, Germany, and England, have laboured to depreciate and to destroy our confidence and our reverence for it. At such a juncture is cause for gratitude that one of the most experienced and honoured of popular divines has himself to the work of expounding this book. We have the first half of the new and the handsome volume before us, and the remainder will soon follow. To call it exaggerated is not to exaggerate, for it is most thorough in mode of treatment, and carefully investigates and analyses the text. All the author's treasures of learning and of intellect are brought to upon the exposition; and the consequence is every prominent word and phrase receives attention, and is pointed out and illustrated. It cannot be a difference of opinion as to the character of the work, for the honesty and ability of the writer are exemplified in every page. We do not mean to say that we can adopt every idea which he advances, but we will say that the book is a most excellent contribution toward a right understanding of St. John's Gospel.

Lost Friends Found Again; or, Heavenly Rest for Christian Mourners. Edited by EDWARD SHEPHERD SMEDLEY. Hamilton, Adams and

MR. SMEDLEY has made a series of selections from celebrated authors on the state of the departed during the period which is to intervene between death and the resurrection, and the recognition and re-union of friends in heaven. These two important subjects are discussed in the twenty chapters into which the work is divided, such subordinate topics as "Happiness of the Defied Spirits," the "Communion of the Dead with the Living," and the "Perpetuity of Sacred Affection." The writer has performed a real service to Christian households anticipating or experiencing the pangs of bereavement, which sooner or later, are called to suffer. It is a melancholy interest to this work that the timable nobleman to whom it is dedicated, Earl of Shaftesbury, has, since its issue, become one of that large class for whose consolation it is specially prepared.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

THE festival day of the Emperor of France is the same as that set apart by the Popish Church for the celebration of the Assumption of the Virgin. Thus one of the greatest names in the Romish calendar is made to lend her honours to the Imperial dynasty that now rules France. It must be said this is not the arrangement of the present Emperor; it was the work of his uncle, and the nephew has done no more than revive so astutely-contrived a festival. Accordingly, on the 15th of last month, not Paris alone, but all France, was in a blaze of decorations, fireworks, and other gaieties; and the visit of the British fleet, which was at the time within the harbour of Cherbourg, was represented by the official journals as a compliment paid by a foreign nation to the name-day of the Emperor. That visit, we may add, has done much to cement the goodwill and friendly feeling which at present subsists between England and France; and it is admitted that the alliance, which formerly was for the most part confined to the two Governments, is now extended to the people. But while these festivities were proceeding, the Emperor, like our own Sovereign, had withdrawn himself from the popular gaze, and he has since been paying a visit to the little Swiss canton where the days of his youth were spent in exile with his mother. The villagers among whom he went gave him a hearty welcome, and there were many who remembered his departure from among them. His excursion is well-timed, for his dominions are tranquil, and the factions and intrigues that have dogged his steps and disturbed his whole reign are for the moment still. Politics are at a discount, but the machinations of the Jesuits are restless as ever. It is said that they have devoted all their arts of late to the perversion of Protestants of distinction in the country, and it is reported that Madame Duruy, the wife of the Minister of Instruction, has, at their instigation, revoked her profession of the Protestant faith. In the meantime it is satisfactory to find that the Word of God is not bound. From the letters of our correspondents it will be seen that Evangelical religion is making head, not against Romanism alone, but against the subtler foe of infidelity in its own borders.

The news from Italy is full of interest. According to our correspondent, King Victor Emmanuel, as he advances in life, begins to feel the superstitious terrors of the Romish Church get the better of his judgment, and to be filled with remorse for the personal and political offences of his past life. Hence, it is said, the recent attempts at reconciliation with Rome, which might have been successful but for the blind obstinacy of the men who are around the Pope, and for which the political and religious reformers of Italy alike give them their thanks. In the meantime a spirit of persecution has been stirred up against persons of the Reformed faith all over Italy; and the priests are everywhere exerting themselves to bring up their flocks to the polling-booth in the forthcoming elections, to vote for candidates who will support the cause of the Church. If a majority can be returned in favour of reconciliation with the Church, it is thought they will meet with little opposition on the part of the King. But in the meantime, the Government proceeds with great energy in their work of consolidating the newly-won liberties of the people. The Minister of Instruction was lately induced to resign; and his successor has already given notice of his intention to introduce into the new Parliament the measure for the secularisation of the revenues of the monasteries and nunneries which was so unaccountably withdrawn in the last session. With such projects on foot, it is plain there can never be real peace between Italy and Rome. There is another measure in which the Government has displayed much energy. The cholera made its appearance at Ancona, and committed dreadful ravages among the population. The priests attempted to persuade the people that this was Heaven's judgment on account of the backslidings of the Government; but the Ministers faced the storm, sent money and gifts to the town; the Commander of the District shifted his head-quarters into the heart of the infected city; and confidence and quiet were restored. It is satisfactory to add that the pestilence has now subsided.

Germany continues to be distracted by the high-handed conduct of her two chief Powers. After long-protracted, angry, and sometimes threatening negotiations, Austria and Prussia have at last come to an agreement respecting the government of the Duchies they wrested from Denmark—a temporary and provisional arrangement they call it, and in a sense it may be so, but we fear there is no chance of any alteration being made in favor of the independence of the people. By this agreement, Holstein and Schleswig, whose invisibility while under Denmark was the war-cry of the Germans, are now wholly separate. Austria taking the administration of Holstein, while Schleswig is made over to Prussia. also is the little Duchy of Lauenburg; in fact, it is formally annexed to the Prussian kingdom; and as some compensation, Prussia pays to Austria a certain sum for her expenses the war. Austria is not to interfere with any part of Schleswig, but Prussia has obtained important concessions in Holstein. Such is the present arrangement; but there is reason to apprehend that the aggression of which this is the immediate result will hereafter bear bitter fruit.

America appears to be slowly settling down from the violent exertions and excitement of the war. The reduction of the military and naval armaments has proceeded at a rapid pace, and has entirely falsified the predictions of those who maintained that, as soon as civil war was at an end, the Union would turn its arms against France or England. The Minister of Finance is doing his utmost to gauge the debt of the country, and to take measures for the payment of the interest. The President is engaged in the yet higher and more arduous task of re-settling the lately insurgent and now conquered States. His work is a difficult one; and the difficulties are aggravated by the resistance he encounters from extreme parties on both sides. The opposition between North and South is not confined to political questions: it extends to ecclesiastical matters as well. Thus, a short time since the bishops of the Episcopal Church in the Northern States held a meeting, at which they invited their brethren in the South to assemble with them again as they were wont to do, and to form one Episcopal Synod throughout the Union. But the bishops in the South declined the invitation, and declared their resolution to have nothing to do with the North, either in religion or politics. No stronger proof could be given of the bitter animosities that still continue to exist between the conquerors and the conquered.

Messrs. Stern and Rosenthal, the missionaries to Abyssinia, with the Consul there, still enduring cruel hardships and privations at the hands of King Theodorus, the tyrant of that country. For more than two years their sufferings have continued; and though no hope of relief appears yet to have dawned upon them, their letters all through their imprisonment, the last as strongly as the first, breathe a remarkable spirit of resignation and meekness—the true tone of martyrs. But though they themselves see no hope of relief, we are glad to say that they are not forgotten either by the Government or by friends at home. Lord Russell has commissioned Mr. Palgrave, whose narrative of his travels through Arabia has become “the book of the season,” to proceed to Abyssinia, and negotiate the deliverance of the captives. In addition to this a subscription is now in course of being raised to send out Dr. Beke, the well-known African traveller, on the same benevolent errand. We have transferred the substance of Messrs. Stern and Rosenthal’s letters to intelligence columns, and we are sure our readers will heartily join in the intercessions and entreat from all Christians on behalf of themselves and their fellow-prisoners, and that the means now employed for their deliverance may be crowned with success.

HOME.

The greatest effort yet put forth by the scientific projectors of our day has failed. The Atlantic Cable has broken, and telegraphic communication with America is not yet accomplished fact. Yet there is enough of promise in what has been done to justify further effort, and the promoters are sanguine that another year will witness the completion of the enterprise. The difficulties in the way are, however, enormous, and it becomes man, in the presence of the stupendous natural forces that are arrayed against him, to speak with humility and caution. Before the Great Eastern started on her last voyage it was confidently given out that every precaution had been taken, every contingency foreseen and guarded against; in practice it was found that the obvious contingency of a break in the cable had been foreseen indeed—for who could fail to foresee it?—but so little provision, that the machinery to be used in the event of its occurrence was of the most inadequate strength, and broke at every application. No doubt this will be abundantly provided for the next effort, but who shall say what other dangers have to be encountered, or what unexpected difficulties may require unprovided remedies? Thus much, however, may be said, that the experiment has been demonstrated to be practicable. It may fail next year.

s it has failed this; new attempts may bring to light new obstacles, but they will also bring the experience and the skill which are requisite to overcome them. It is impossible for a Christian mind to regard this, and kindred adventures which are making in the scientific world, without a feeling of strange interest. God in His providence is lifting His hand as it were, and disclosing to us one long-concealed mystery after another. Never was there before so visible a progress made towards the fulfilment of man's high destiny: "Thou hast put all things under his feet." Can we be wrong in the belief, that this is but a presage and a preliminary to his still higher destiny, when man so endowed and honoured shall universally bow the knee to Jesus, and confess that "He is Lord, to the glory of God the Father?"

It requires faith to believe this. In an intellectual point of view, human progress is visible; morally we are almost tempted to think man is retrograding. Our journals from day to day are filled with the records of great crimes—crimes which to our ancestors would have seemed monstrous and unnatural, but with which we are forced to become painfully familiar, and which are perpetrated, for the most part, not under the pressure of great temptation, but from the unbridled indulgence of an unrestrained will. In our last number some shocking instances of these atrocities were referred to; and we have still further to add to the black catalogue. A gambler and betting-man who went by various aliases poisoned the three children of a woman who had been his mistress, simply out of spite because she, awaking to a sense of her sinful life, resolved to break off her connexion with him; and then, all the wickedness of his heart being stirred within him, he proceeded to Ramsgate, where his own deserted wife and child were living, and deliberately murdered them both. The scoundrel has both before and since his apprehension emitted a great deal of rant about the social inequalities of life having driven him to these deeds; but all this fustian appears to be no more than the stock-in-trade of a begging-letter impostor, which profession is also followed; his real motives appear to have been mere vulgar spite and revenge. Close following this, we find a mother murdering three of her children, and giving no other reason for so doing than that she was about to be sent into the hospital to undergo an operation, and that she did not like to leave them. There is some reason to hope that the wretched woman was insane; but what is to be said for the blank want of trust and hope in a mind that could brood itself into morbidness on a subject like that? After such a catalogue of horrors it may seem a small matter to record that a military officer has been shot by a private, in revenge for some trifling punishment to which he had been justly sentenced. It is painful to record these facts, but we cannot help regarding them as signs of the times. They are indications of a spirit of utter lawlessness and self-will being abroad among us—a temper that will submit to no check, and refuses all restraint—a disposition of mind utterly opposed to the meekness and obedience inculcated by the Gospel. They are blotches on the surface that indicate the malady that is preying on the vitals of the people. Even heathen authors have looked upon such outbursts of wickedness, when occurring in their day, as premonitions of the downfall of states.

The most thoughtless amongst us are constrained to confess that the judgments of God are abroad in the land. The scourge of cholera has for some time past been, as it were, suspended over our heads, though hitherto we have been mercifully spared the infliction; but our cattle have been smitten with a strange and mysterious disease never before seen in this land, and which has hitherto baffled all medical skill. It was at first supposed to have been imported from the Continent, where, in Russia, a similar disease has for some time prevailed; but the most minute investigation has failed to discover that a single infected animal has found its way from abroad to our shores. The disease appears to have broken out in our own land, and hitherto there is no sign that the plague has been stayed. The metropolis has suffered severely, as might perhaps have been expected, from the close, unhealthy sheds of our metropolitan dairymen; but there is scarcely a county, either in England or Scotland, that has escaped visitation. Ireland is as yet exempted from the plague. The harvest also is believed to be below an average crop; and there is reason to fear that after a long-continued and not always properly used prosperity, we are now about to suffer from the Divine chastisements. May they issue in a higher and purer national life!

MISSIONS IN AFRICA AND ELSEWHERE.

BY DAVID LIVINGSTONE, M.D.*

DURING the last half-century the conviction has gradually gained ground in our nation that our race is destined to colonise and Christianise the world. The numbers of those who feel a personal interest in this matter, and who consider their honour at stake as to the manner in which England performs her mission to mankind, had so largely increased at the period of our national fast in connexion with the Indian mutiny, that the Times, in its character of index to public opinion, roundly asserted that the diffusion of our people and the propagation of our faith were duties incumbent on all who watch with longing hearts the indications of the coming of the reign of peace and goodwill among men. It is interesting to observe the different modes in which free Christian people embody their aspirations for the "good time coming." The agencies by which all things are to be gathered together unto Him who is the Lord over all things cannot be numbered;—many of them are as unconscious of the end to which He is guiding them as are the agents who unconsciously combine to supply our great metropolis with daily bread. Each pursues his own self-interest, but co-operates in feeding the multitudes, with a regularity, completeness, and economy which could not be attained by the wisest Government in the world. The record of our race, with its free institutions and its power derived from scientific knowledge, reveals to us many unconscious co-operators fulfilling the prophecy that many shall run to and fro, and knowledge be increased. But we have also the conscious co-operators—"the workers together with God." Hitherto their work has been very much of an experiment; and when success has followed any peculiar operation, there the modus operandi has at once been declared to be divine. The Moravian missionaries, for instance, laboured long among the snows of Greenland, and, as they imagined, with no success: but when their own hearts, which had been chilled and cheerless, were warmed by a return to the great source of all light and love, they told the story of redemption by the blood of Christ—a story which, though more than eighteen hundred years old, is ever new and ever soul-reviving. The glow from their own hearts touched those of the hitherto apparently indifferent Greenlanders, and henceforth they declared that the only mode of reaching the heathen mind was to preach the Saviour's dying love, and that alone. That wondrous fact is unquestionably the central point around which the whole Gospel turns, and it ought always to have the prominence which the Bible gives it; but that single announcement, apart from what the good men had been long teaching, about God and about the soul and the life to come, and, as they thought, teaching in v would never have converted the Greenlanders.

* Dr. Livingstone left London on the 14th of August, proceeding to Bombay, on his way back to Africa. The object of his present expedition is to find a path by which commerce and Christianity may enter Africa from the eastern coast, and independently of the Portuguese Government, who claim 1,360 miles of the seaboard, and use it for slave-trading purposes. It is to be regretted that the French and British Governments do not take effectual means for opening that coast, or at least for counteracting the iniquitous procedure of the Portuguese: in the meanwhile, all philanthropists will pray for the success of the brave and kind-hearted explorer. Before leaving England, Dr. Livingstone had on several occasions expressed views regarding the mode of conducting missions, which many thought would be of great service if more widely known. He was, therefore, urged to commit them to writing. The engrossment of every hour made this impossible, until he found comparative quiet in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer. There the paper printed above was written, and we are sure that its statements and opinions will be received with the consideration due, not only to the eminent ability of the author, but still more to that large-heartedness which has raised him far above all sectarianism, and gained him ardent friends in all communions.—ED. of Evangelical Christendom.

Spiritual discernment is necessary to guide the missionary as to what is neces in each particular case and national peculiarity. The Jew, for instance, was pr in the first ages with the great fact that the true Messiah had indeed come to g repentance unto Israel and the remission of sins; and the Reformers showed discernment by giving exceeding great prominence to salvation by grace, in op tion to salvation by works. The example of manual labour, so beneficial in African, would be out of place in the Indian missionary. It would be labo vain to teach the Africans the English tongue, except as we teach the classics t more advanced and talented. It shows far-reaching forethought to teach language to the East Indian natives, inasmuch as they have other motives fo acquisition, and through the literature of Christianity, they are led into the ences and atmosphere with which Christian lands have been long familiar. In A and in all countries where the patriarchal form of government prevails, the sionary should take advantage of the existing state of things as far as pos Whatever defects may be found in the government of a chief, it is better anarchy; and nothing should be done to weaken his power. In all mea of social reform it is best to work to some extent through the ruler. and respectful deportment will secure his co-operation, at least they will re opposition. The system followed by our Moravian brethren has much to recom it. The natives associated together in a mission station form a Christian fa Heathen practices are forbidden, and, as far as possible, the world, the flesh, and devil are excluded. But the members are all exotic plants, and however well they conduct themselves when under the eye of their spiritual teachers, no soon they exposed to the temptations of the outer world than they fall into sin. who have led irreproachable lives while within the institution cannot be sent neighbouring village, where public-houses or other haunts of iniquity abound, out disgracing themselves. It is otherwise when men are led to embrace C tianity in their usual modes of life. When they are subjected to the common of their faith in their accustomed walk, they become hardier and more stable of the Lord's planting, and unquestionably their influence on the ultimate diff of our faith is wider and more lasting.

In all cases this last consideration ought to be ever present to the mind of missionary. However valuable genuine conversions may be, they are m indications of the setting in of a current which will flow on to the en time. It is probable that the leaven which he is introducing into the of the native mind, though it is unseen in its effects, is of more value in rel to the great ultimate result than the incidental conversions, which may occas more lively joy at the moment. Modern missionary work, in some respects, has one of experiment; it is still more a process of preparation. The Word whi given is the living Word, which abideth for ever. It will perform all that its Di Author intended, and those who may see the eventual effects of the present pr tion will understand that during all the long periods of apparently small result kingdom was coming without observation. The missionary comes to the heathen the morning star in the darkness before the dawn; he precedes the coming of whose right it is to reign. The diffused grey light of morning follows, and then sun in all his glory, as in future days, will come—the Sun of Righteousness, healing in his beams. So far as conversions are concerned, the future missions or more probably native pastors, will appear as far more successful; but the work now done will be rewarded and be held in honoured remembrance—ju we now gratefully recal “Reformers before the Reformation.”

In this short paper we can only glance at one or two points, which, if received in the same kindly spirit in which they are offered, may aid as to the manner in which the missionary work is performed. The atrocious misrepresentations of Captain Burton, in his cold-blooded attack on the character of the missionaries on the West Coast of Africa, cause some hesitation in the mind as to whether anything which might be construed into censure ought to be penned; but the possibility of producing an amendment in the proceedings of men otherwise most estimable must be our apology for apparent fault-finding. As a rule, the conduct of the missionaries of every denomination is kind and conciliatory to each other, and, in our own experience, the differences which are made much of at home were pretty well forgotten abroad. But in one or two portions of the missionary field there has been a strange departure from Christian courtesy. In Honolulu, and in the Orange River Free State, for instance, where missionaries had been labouring for some thirty years, bishops of the Church of England have been sent out, as if to the heathen. In the one case, the long years of toil, and subsequent success, the American missionaries in the Sandwich Islands have been virtually ignored, and a bishop entered into their labours, but refused to join in prayer with his predecessors because, forsooth, these men, whose labours have been rewarded by apostolic success, did not acknowledge the dogma of "apostolic succession." In the other case, a bishop entered into a field where the Wesleyan and French Protestant missionaries have had their labours similarly sealed with divine approbation, to the extent of several thousand converts; and yet Bishop Twells is supposed to have gone to the heathen. Now, ordinary good manners, such as the Bishop of Honolulu and Bishop Twells must have maintained in England, would have suggested a different line of conduct than that of ignoring previous Evangelical labours. We are very far from supposing that the introduction of a superior style of education and Christian example, such as we may imagine a bishop of the Church of England would bring, ought not to be acquiesced in by men of less pretence and simpler creed. In fact, the field is so wide, and the wants of the world are so pressing, that personally we would sacrifice years of labour and success, and all the associations of friendship in a tribe, to those weaker brethren who, albeit utterly apostolic in their succession, prefer another man's line of things made ready to their hands, to going, like Paul, unto "regions beyond;" but it is so un-English for a bishop to go about, even in Honolulu, with a paper mitre on his head; and so unlike the bearing of a high-minded English gentleman, as we believe Bishop Twells to be, to refrain from frankly acknowledging the status which the French missionaries and their converts in South Africa have attained, that we trust good manners will yet regain their sway. The gallant manliness so much admired in the English Universities, and so well exemplified in the conduct of the dear, love-compelling Mackenzie, and in the labours of the noble Bishops Selwyn and Paterson, ought to be the indispensable qualification of every man who aspires to be a missionary bishop; and if any one, instead of going to the actual heathen, enters a field already cultivated, and surreptitiously plumes himself with feathers not his own, the man has no more right to the term missionary than Mr. Smith has to the noble name of Howard.

Nor must we be too anxious to find acceptance amongst communities not yet Christianised for all those peculiarities which have become endeared to ourselves. The theological systems of Europe, Latin and Teutonic, may not be the very form in which the creed of the coming Oriental Christendom shall most naturally embody itself; but it should be enough to make us rejoice if India and China learn to call Jesus blessed. Much as he may love his own solemn and severely simple form of worship, no right-minded Presbyterian would be offered if it should turn out that greater liveliness and variety are more adapted to the light-hearted children of the sunny South. In the same way, if we miss not, the best men in the Church of England, in sending out missions, have no desire to send out men who may propagate any of the "isms" which happen to prevail at home, but holy men, who, bent on fulfilling the Master's commission, will withal faithfully represent that Church in its greatness and catholicity.

It would require very considerable space to contrast the state of East Africa with the West Coast, where very great results have followed the British anti-slave-trade policy, aided and supplemented by lawful traders and by Christian missions. In East Africa we have the tribes living in forced seclusion from all human influences. Thirteen hundred and sixty miles of coast—or from Cape Delagoa to Delagoa Bay—are rigidly shut up from all foreign commerce, save that in accordance with the Government of Portugal falsely asserting that this prodigious territory belongs to it; while West Africa proves, by the increase of lawful trade to upwards of three millions annually, by more than a hundred mission stations—English, German, and American—by hundreds of schools, and some twenty thousand reformed converts—that our statesmen have been promoters of peace and goodwill in the widest sense, and that our missionaries have been blessings not only to thousands on the coast, but have been preparing the way for invaluable benefits for millions in the interior.

The effete Government of Portugal seals up this large territory by unpardonable assertions of dominion, where it has actually to pay the native peoples a heavy annual tribute for leave to cultivate the small patches adjacent to the mud forts. By a delusive dream they deceive themselves into the belief that at some time or other, English capitalists will form for them a second India Company. A no less important person than the Viscount de Sá da Bandeira, when Minister of Marine and the Colonies, put forth a program to this effect in print: Schools, churches, roads, &c., were all to be constructed for the natives to be civilised, or, in fact, all that has been done so successfully on the West Coast was to be performed by this company, and the whole was to be back at the end of nineteen years!! Whatever others may say of the philanthropic efforts of England, the wisest Portuguese statesmen would fain, for the sake of the material benefits, have the like operations performed for them. We know of no other reason for our Government submitting to have its noble anti-slave-trade policy so long baffled by the miserable Portuguese pretence to dominion over a great region, but the European "balance of power." This little nation, in Europe the part which the "Pope's brass band" performs in the British Parliament, leaning alternately to England and to France, as best serves its immediate purpose. Making very good laws against slavery and the slave-trade is one way in which the leaning to England is manifested; and, after self-complacent swagger, the laws remain a dead letter. Lately, the King of Portugal proposed a new law for the abolition of slavery. This is evidently the result of a quaking dread of the Americans, who, having shaken themselves free of the incubus, will now look not only at the slave-trade, but at slavery itself in a new light. It is not at all unlikely that a great freedom-loving nation like our Transatlantic brethren may view the whole subject in an international light. Our West Indian plantations suffered ruin in many cases because, while we ceased to commit the great wrong of forced and unrequited labour, Brazil and Cuba undersold them by continuing the system which justice required us to abandon. It is possible that the American

I view forced labour anywhere as an act of injustice to be resented by all the members of the community of nations. Fear of this, and not love of liberty, seems to impel the King of Portugal.

Our object in returning to Africa is to open the country to the north of the contentious claims of the Portuguese; and if a small beginning is made similar to that which has been so successful in West Africa, we shall feel that we have rendered little service to the cause of human progress and Messiah's kingdom.

MEDICINE AND MEDICAL MISSIONS.

From two books of the Bible we are indebted to the pen of a "beloved physician," and some of the finest specimens of the Christian character have been yielded to the medical profession. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood; Denham, the father of the modern practice of physic; Jenner, whose preservative from a frightful malady is saving the lives of myriads yearly; the pride of Holland, Verhaave; and that prodigy of learning, the Swiss physiologist, Haller—were all of those men who, devoted to their own profession, did not forget their higher calling, and who, living for their neighbour and their God, closed their career of beneficence with honour in the blessed hope of the Gospel.

Still, in many minds there exists an impression as if the practice of the healing art were inimical to the humane and Christian attributes of character. And no doubt instances may be quoted where medical men have been materialists and scoffers, and some of our readers may be able to recal individuals whom they have known, and who were rough and heartless, or sordid and mercenary. But as far as our own observation and experience entitle us to judge, eminence in this, as in all other professions, is usually allied to eminent virtues. No doubt there are exceptions. A man may be swift and bold in surgery, or may have acquired peculiar skill in grappling with some form of malady, without any special greatness or goodness; but, in order to deal with disease in all its varieties, and benefit the sufferer in all his moods and seasons, qualities of head and heart are wanted which seldom meet in the same individual; and at once strong-minded and tender-hearted, with prompt decisiveness yet a profound sense of responsibility, courageous, yet careful, gentle and kind, the attributes which make a good physician would ensure distinction in almost every department of human exertion; and not only in justice to a noble profession, for the sake of our readers, we should like to point out some of the qualities of a good physician.

We claim for him, first of all, humanity. If war is the art of hurting, medicine is the art of healing; and He whose advent was announced as "peace on earth" commenced His career not only preaching the Gospel, but "healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people." The twofold maladies, moral and physical, spiritual and corporeal—sin and its attendant suffering—drew forth His compassion, and, contemning neither, He healed them both. And he is the best practitioner who treads the closest in that great Master's steps, and from the same kind heart and elevated character a virtue goes forth and benefits the soul, at the same time that his prescriptions heal the body. Harsh or heartless men are found in all callings. They are found even amongst ministers. But the palm of humanity we are inclined to concede to the medical profession. It is putting continual efforts to preserve life and mitigate suffering; and the tendency of a volent effort is to make the heart more and more tender. Hence we have many able physicians whose rest was so disturbed and whose minds were so burdened by critical cases, that they lost their own health in curing their patients; and of our readers must be so happy as to know the friendly adviser whose counte-

The dangerous ship was forbidden to put in, and notice was given that any one who went on board should not be permitted. Surgeons were already dead, and there was no one to take a hospital, when Sidney Barnard volunteered, was put on board with a malady, and fell a victim to his self-devotion.*

Nor, perhaps, are we, when patients, sufficiently alive to thank the friendly physician. True: the members of the faculty administer remedies and prophylactics; but they are not invulnerable. In an infected atmosphere, they themselves often catch the danger, and fall back into their home; and though a grateful country commends them, they fall beneath the cannon-ball, and makes some provision for them in his visits of mercy from hovel to hovel and lane to lane, the physician, by the deadly pestilence, has perished in his prime, many may pity him, but it occurs to few that the honours paid to Wolfe, and Moore, also due to the heroes, not in uniform, who have fallen on the battle-field.

Generosity. Dr. Lettsom was once sent for down into the country by a gentleman. His patient had once been a rich and munificent man, but had been ruined by the American war. Pointing to his garden, "This was once the property of my family, and they are part of my family. And my children must leave it to me, and I must sell it for sale, Dr. Lettsom went home and bought it, and sent the doctor to the owner, who under this prescription quickly recovered. Jean Lettsom would come home from his daily round so exhausted, that when he would announce a patient anxious to see him, he would beg the visit of his medical brethren; but the message would come back, "They cannot afford the fee." "Then, in that case," said Hallé, "I will go and see him. I must see him. Ask him to come in." There is scarcely a man who is not giving his gratuitous services to some benevolent institution—dispensary, or hospital, or Invalid Home—and who by these professions constitutes himself the most munificent of all the contributors to the relief of the poor. By a Christian physician whom we knew, "I have received as five hundred guineas from one patient; but for every one who has given me that sum, at least, from whom I accepted nothing." Like many of which, under God, he owed his rapid rise and enduring reputation. Averse to the profession, he forced himself to enter it, because it was his father's wish ; and naturally revolting from research into the structure of the human frame, he compelled himself to be a skilful dissector, and became one of the most famous anatomical draughtsmen whom England has yielded. Nor have we a nobler specimen of devoted industry than in the self-denial with which he closed his eyes on magazines and newspapers and amusing literature till his great and laborious works were ended. And there is something spirit-stirring in the swift and steady rise to the high places of the faculty of the youth who came to London with only one private acquaintance there. But the grandest thing of all is to see how this vigorous mind was at once strengthened and softened by the grace of God. Whilst travelling in Italy he got acquainted with a pious English family, and impressed by the happy scene he witnessed there, he wrote to his brother, " Whatever the world may say, my dear George, it is a clear case to me that the saints have the laugh on their side. If wishing would add me to their number, I would get enrolled to-morrow." And it was not long till he got "enrolled." Soon after his settlement in London he felt constrained to bestow all the energies of his calm and comprehensive intellect on the study of revealed religion ; and under the teaching of God's Spirit he was soon guided into a conclusive belief of the great saving truth. To that Divine Redeemer whom he then discovered his soul clave with an affiance which the events of life never shook, and which death only made final ; and with a singleness of aim betokening the child of God, he learned to look on every step in his professional rise as an additional advantage for promoting God's glory in the world. There were three things in his eminently intelligent but no less practical piety which we think can never be too often recalled, nor too much sought after, his reverence for the Sabbath, his constant recourse to prayer, and the Christian composure with which he anticipated his departure out of the world and made preparation for it. On the Lord's-day he always attended public worship twice, and he usually contrived to secure several hours for the study of his only theological text-book, the Bible. And so much did he honour the Divine command, " Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," that twice over he cheerfully risked his appointment to an important office, rather than canvass or do "any work" on that day. And rejoicing in God's special providence, believing that to omnipotence there is nothing arduous, and to omniscience nothing too minute, he was a man of prayer. "No work was commenced without asking for the Divine blessing ; no important step taken without applying for the Divine guidance ; when harassed by professional vexation, it was by prayer he regained his wonted serenity ; and when surrounded by difficulties and threatened by disappointment, in prayer he found a strength not his own, and submission to the will of God, whatever that might be." And just as his life was devoted to God, so the Lord wonderfully supported his servant when he came to die. In his fortieth year, stricken with a mortal malady, his clear foresight told the end and nearly fixed the date. But having already completed the grand preparation, his main anxiety was to fill up the nine months on which he counted with work that should serve his generation. He continued to prescribe for patients as long as his strength permitted, and then stopped, only reserving time to complete two medical memoirs, and as he found that his handbreadth would hardly suffice for this purpose, he tried to redeem the ebbing hours by discontinuing his daily exercise. Closing his town residence and bidding good bye to his patients, he escaped to Hampstead ; and though he knew that it was the house where in a few weeks he must take his last look of earth, he never gazed on spring with such youthful glee as the morning after arriving there. He was only once in his carriage after that. It was to visit Highgate Cemetery, and fix all about his funeral. And as, in his own view, the grave was radiant with the light of immortality, he was anxious that others should see it as he saw it himself, and calling him his only child, he would say, "You see, Theodore, what a lucky fellow I am! You have your fortune to make; but mine is ready made for me. I am going to my heavenly inheritance. You know how hard I used to work formerly to get it for you and mamma; but all that is over now; my toil is at an end." The radiance of the better country had so settled all around him, that his dearest friends saw heaven open for him; and every indication of nearer departure sensibly cheered himself. His trust was all in Jesus. "I have often taken a practical chapter of the New Testament, such as the winding up of one of the Epistles, or the Sermon on the Mount. I have determined to act up to it during the day; but, alas! I forgot it altogether, and when I did remember it, how miserably did I fall short of it. This, more than anything, showed me the original sin in my nature, and threw me on the promises of Christ. I found it was useless to rest too much on details, but I took fast hold upon the grand leading truth, that Christ is an all-sufficient satisfaction for sin." And at last, one happy midnight, when he found him dying, he said to his wife, "I will not make speeches; but I have a few things to say." The first was an affectionate farewell to herself; and in uttering it he was seized with violent coughing. When that had abated, she reminded him that he had something else to say, and begged him to take the earliest opportunity. "The second is soon said. Christ is all in all to me. I have no hope except in Him. He is, indeed, all in all."

Time would fail were we recalling men who, like Abercrombie, and Miller, Marshall Hall, at once adorned their profession and the doctrine of their God. Saviour; as well as others who, like Bateman of London, Gordon of Hull, and Foulton of St. Andrew's, magnified Divine grace in their ultimate conversion and peaceful departure.

Our remarks have extended till we have little space in which to notice a society whose object is to propagate the Gospel amongst the heathen by means of well-qualified medical practitioners. The Edinburgh Society has existed for twenty-four years, and under the direction of such men as Dr. William Brown, Professors James Wilson, Simpson, and MacLagan, Drs. Wood and Huie, and Mr. Benjamin Bell, it aided in their professional education many young men who have subsequently gone out to India, China, Madagascar, and Syria, and who are now labouring there with Christian devotedness for the temporal and spiritual amelioration of the people. There is much in the training of a medical man which, if his heart is touched by the Spirit of God, pre-eminently qualifies him for the work of a missionary, in which patience, gentleness, self-denial, and ready resourcefulness are so constantly called for; and from the days of Vanderkemp down to those of Hobson, Lockhart, Livingstone, we have abundant proof that there is no better plan amongst the heathen abroad, or "unenlightened people" at home, than the Master's own method who made the healing of all manner of sickness ancillary to the preaching of the Gospel. The Edinburgh Society has a most interesting and successful Mission Dispensary in the Cowgate; and we should greatly rejoice if this and other features of its work were carried out by similar organizations in London and other large cities.

VINET'S OUTLINES OF THEOLOGY.

WITH a volume before us bearing the honoured name of Vinet, we are more desirous of availing ourselves of what it contains than of expressing an opinion concerning it; and we are very sure that our readers will prefer to converse, through our pages, with that kind, devout, and admirable writer, than to listen to criticism on the literary, theological, or philosophical qualities of his books. We may be permitted, however, to say that, in this volume, considered as a whole, and in connexion with its title, there is something which disappoints a British reader. The phrase, "Outlines of Theology" suggests to us more of system and continuity than it exhibits. It is not a formal treatise, nor does it owe its origin to an effort on the part of Vinet to set forth in logical order and completeness his conception of theological truth. It is a collection of fundamental ideas on the subject, gathered from his works, and arranged under several heads, by an editor, M. Astie. In a note prefixed to the volume, the publisher contemplates the possibility that there may be "a slight discrepancy between passages brought from different works into an unintended proximity," and submits that "the reputation of M. Vinet, a writer distinguished for his clearness of style, ought not to suffer from this." Nothing could be more reasonable; but while doing justice both to M. Vinet and M. Astie, whose task was one which it was almost impossible to accomplish with entire success, we cannot help feeling and saying that these "Outlines of Theology" would have possessed greater value and attractiveness if they had been conceived and executed by Vinet himself.

It is partly an advantage, partly a disadvantage, to the works of Vinet, that they were composed in a sceptical age, when the teacher of Christianity felt it necessary to have his sword always girt upon his thigh, because of abounding and inveterate enemies. This is an advantage, inasmuch as it renders them specially appropriate to the present time, specially useful to those who may either experience, or who may be led by duty or circumstance to grapple with, its intellectual doubts and difficulties. Vinet's shield has two sides; a golden, reflecting the light of heaven; a silver, turning away the shafts of adversaries. But there is also a disadvantage in this constant presence of the polemical element. To the Christian who has never known either doubt, or sympathy with doubt, there is something irksome in thus being always reminded that Christianity has been called in question. Contented with the Promised Land, they seek to enjoy its milk and honey without any consciousness that the enemy is on its borders, without any feeling that it may be their duty to rise from under the shadow of the fig-tree or the pleasant clustering of the vine and to go out to battle. The part of Solomon, to build the Lord's house and worship in it, is what they choose, not the part of David, who was a man of war from his youth and the champion of God's host. It cannot be disputed that, as a general rule, the apologetic defence of Christianity has not been combined with the habit of expatiating in its glory and drinking deeply into its spirituality. It is in Jeremy Taylor, and Howe, and Baxter, not in Butler, in Paley, or in Barrow, that the flow of Christian feeling is most rich and full, that the joy and tenderness of Christian experience are most lovingly and rapturously displayed. To Christians of simple faith, whose religion is more in life than in logic, it is not a pleasure, but a duty, often an irksome duty, to read "books on the evidences," and we never read Vinet without being sensible that he is always guarding against some contemporary error, or putting himself in a position of defence against some sceptical objection. But if this characteristic of his works is in some respects a disadvantage, it is not without its redeeming points. If the duty of rendering a reason for the faith that is in us is hard to perform, it is nevertheless clearly prescribed, and is in these days specially incumbent. Nor can it be alleged that the coldness generally characteristic of apologists belongs to Vinet. If his faith is clearly and logically apprehended, it is yet warm, enthusiastic, childlike. His Christian religion is indeed surrounded by a rampart, formidable in height, massive in strength, mounted with a powerful artillery; but within is his own dwelling, embosomed in soft verdure, fresh with foliage and with fountain, without sufficient agitation in the atmosphere to disturb the dew upon the flowers. It is indeed a rare and admirable combination which we have in Vinet of several things seldom united; first, simplicity and strength of faith; secondly, sympathy with all honest doubt, and fine appreciation of the intellectual difficulties of our time; thirdly, decision, energy, uncompromising force in meeting objections. There is tenderness, but no trifling, in Vinet's mode of dealing with adversaries; there is exact logical apprehension, but there is also the rapture abounding vitality, in his personal religion. The power of argument he knows, and can put his thoughts in best argumentative form, but it is the look of Jesus that has ravished his own soul, and which, he knows, will convert the world. This idea, in fact, is his own, and readers will thank us for laying it before them in his own words. "In proportion," he exclaims, "as our gaze upon Jesus becomes prolonged, it excites a holy enthusiasm, a holy love, within us; it renders these dispositions habitual and dominant; it becomes the light as well as the warmth of our life; it facilitates, simplifies, irradiates everything; it does more than refute doubts, it absorbs them; it quenches in its brightness all false or equivocal glimmers; it puts aside frivolous questions; casts off subtleties as refuse; creates a triumphant evidence; and transporting us beforehand into the light of heaven, it places below our feet the clouds that once hovered above our heads. All the treasures of wisdom are comprised in this light of the cross. It does not give us trust in God without giving us distrust of ourselves; nay, it makes this very distrust a portion of our faith, an element of our strength, an earnest of our safety. It inspires us, in short, with humility and courage both; by concentrating on one object our hopes and our gaze, and continually reminding us, by the mouth of the prophet, to 'look at the rock whence we were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence we were digged.' This one word, this one object, the cross, may suffice to make Christians, and without it nothing suffices. The proper subject of apostleship, of the missionary as of the pastor, is to announce Jesus Christ; this is his first lesson; and it is the strength, the grace, the meaning, the key of all the others. O marvel far beyond our conceptions! A look—a simple look—I say not an argument, a study, a trial—a simple look converts the world; and the essential work of the minister is to induce sinners, these dense multitudes of another desert, to raise their weary heads from the ground, and turn their eyes in the direction pointed out. All the complications and difficulties of Christian life melt away of themselves in this blessed unity of the Christian's look upon Jesus! This look, in all that simplicity which makes a child capable of it, suffices for everything; it is the instrument of the most varying effects, the remedy for most opposite diseases. It is equally victorious over the perplexities of systems, the anguish of doubt, the attacks of pride and of despair, the temptations of pleasure and of grief, the bitterness of hatred, and the weakness of natural affections. When we contemplate the cross, a light issues therefrom which swallows up all darkness, a flash of love which consumes all dislikes. All arguments, combinations, counter-arguments, methods, are not equal, for the heart, or even for the mind, to one look directed to Jesus; and even where other means prove useful (and who would deny that they do so?), this look, this light, are still necessary to quicken and confirm them all."

M. Astie very properly commences the "Outlines of Theology" with Vinet's view of conscience and of the relation to conscience of man on the one hand and the Gospel on the other. The discussion is fundamental in relation to the whole subject handled in the book, and, able as that discussion is, we could wish that it were less in the style of the sermon or the essay, and more in that of the academic lecture or philosophical treatise. "What," asks Vinet, "is conscience?" It is, he replies, "the light by which we judge the value of any given action in an abstract and objective point of view." This, he maintains, would involve its appearing "variable, uncertain, and dependent on local prejudices." It is "that secret voice which condemns whatever we do against our internal conviction." There is in this view no essential departure from that of Butler, and we regard it as correct. We require, however, somewhat greater precision and completeness than we find in Vinet's statements on the subject. What is the purport of the expression, "internal conviction?" Our convictions are diverse. In some instances they are purely intellectual, in some they relate to self-interest, in some they turn upon duty. The authoritative instinct of our nature tells us that intellectual consistency and intelligent selfishness—that is to say, perfect obedience in either case to our convictions—are very different things from conscientiousness. Conscience, in one word, is the moral imperative, not the imperative of intellect, of appetite, or of the æsthetic perceptions. On this point Vinet has hardly learned so much as Butler and Kant could have taught him. He is right, however, in insisting upon the imperative element as essential to conscience, and in finding the source of moral aberration never in obedience to conscience, but always in the biasing influence by which conscience is perverted. "What is there that has not been affirmed respecting the divergencies and aberrations of conscience? And yet it has none; it can have none according to our conception of it! People have quoted the instance of the savage who kills his aged parent from a sense of duty. This perversion of intellect horrifies us; this degradation makes us blush; we see in it a flagrant misapprehension of natural feeling and of moral law. But for all that, it is not conscience that is impaired; it retains all its entirety, only it is profaned; it is an excellent talent employed in the service of crime." The question, however, is, how this profaning and impairing can be brought about. Conscience—such in effect is Vinet's position—acts as it is directed by other influences, and a rule for its guidance must be sought for external to itself. "Conscience," he proceeds, "is nearly allied with the self—that is to say, with all our affections and all our interests. By right, conscience is the indwelling guardian whom we maintain at our own cost, to watch over and take account of our actions; but we distract this guardian, we bribe him, we associate him with our interests, we seat him at our table, and make him drain with us the intoxicating cup; he identifies himself with our passions, espouses their cause; forgetting his character of judge, he becomes our partisan, and only from time to time remembers his own special function." This is true, but it does not seem to us to explain the whole phenomenon, or even its more peculiar and startling manifestations. There are cases in which conscience is so befooled as to be identified with and use the accents of avarice—that "good old-gentlemanly vice" which, from its stealthy foot and quiet air and external decency, is so frequently mistaken for a virtue; there are instances in which conscience becomes the slave of cruelty, of anger, of almost every base passion. Jonah's conscience seems to have been thoroughly gained over to his side when he "did well to be angry." But in the most remarkable cases of aberration of conscience, selfishness cannot be said to have been, obviously at least, the perverting agent. When the priests of Baal cut themselves with knives, when the worshippers of Moloch passed their children through the fire, when the devotees were crushed like worms beneath the wheels of Juggernaut, it is not enough to say that selfishness triumphed over conscience. It was in obedience to a stern and urgent command—a command which they would have disobeyed if they dared—a command which seemed to be that of conscience in express and positive form—that those things were done. How account for this? We think that deviation from that comparative purity to which we appear to draw nearer as we follow the stream of human history to its source commenced with gradual lapses, with slowly deepening shades of error, and that the influence under which conscience was fatally astray was always a simulation of its own true and articulate utterance. The compass points naturally to the pole. Bring near it substances having no magnet power, and it will continue so to point. But place masses of iron in close proximity to it, let influences of the same kind as that of the pole act upon it, and it will no longer point to the north. If the disturbing influences are increased in number and heightened in potency, a time will come when the pointing of the needle is utterly useless to direct the vessel's path, and when, unless the mariners can look upward and steer by the unchanging stars, she must wander farther and farther from the course. So was it with the vessel of humanity directed by conscience. Influences which to its language and seemed akin to itself, extremes of zeal passing into cruel intensity of faith petrifying into fanaticism, restraint of carnal appetite degenerating into fierce scorn of the body and into the notion that pain is acceptable to the Deity—deflected conscience from its steady heavenward pointing, and originated the hideous idolatries on which atheism itself might seem an improvement. Conscience having been thus perverted, the moral guidance of the race depended on the grace of the Almighty in kindling for them the celestial lights of revelation, and affording them a moral rule for lack of which the imperative of conscience had often been tyranny of error and a service of crime.

In a work so considerable as these "Outlines of Theology," especially when it consists of selections by an editor instead of a systematic whole by an author, there must necessarily occur observations which are trite, or even border upon platitude. These, however, are the exception, the rare exception, and the more we have studied the book the more have we found not only that its individual remarks are, in a vast majority of instances, suggestive in thought and felicitous in expression, but that there is more organic connexion between them than is at first perceived. Not the least gratifying of their characteristics is their thorough agreement with the spirit and letter of Christianity, as these are apprehended by Bible Christians in Great Britain. It is seldom that in Continental writings there is not, more or less, a want of harmony with the most earnest religion of this country. But so thoroughly orthodox, as well as thoroughly Protestant, is Vinet, that in any British pulpit his discourses would excite no sensation except on the ground of their superior excellence. The following, on the doctrine of the atonement, is not new, but it could not be better said, and it never could be said unseasonably: "The mystery of redemption is and will always remain a mystery, and the Gospel announces but does not explain it. . . . Speaking honestly, do you suppose that the One in whose honour and under whose worship the world has changed its laws, morals, and spirit, and followed, for eighteen centuries, despite the obstacles placed in its path by the enemies and corrupters of this work, one invariable direction—do you suppose that He was in the eyes of that world only the first of sages and the most virtuous of men? No; He was the Crucified; He was the Redeemer. It was before no lesser personage that eighteen centuries, one after the other, came to bow their head, and to emblazon on their standard, raise on their palaces, engrave on the seals of their republic, the image of a disgraceful torture. It was necessary that He who had endured it should in their eyes be more than a devoted friend of man; He must needs have been a Redeemer—more than a martyr—a God! Efface from the Gospel, I do not say the cross, but the Evangelical meaning of the cross, you render these eighteen centuries absurd or impossible. We ought not to be afraid of declaring that but for this the Gospel would long ago have ceased to be talked of in the world—if, indeed, it ever had been much talked of. It is not so much the Gospel that has preserved for us the doctrine of the cross, as this doctrine that has preserved the Gospel. . . . God, purposing to make the true love which is the foretaste and earnest of eternal life bloom within our hearts, has begun by speaking to us of righteousness. He has awakened in our minds the idea of it, together with the sense of our unrighteousness. He has, by the impenitence and threat of the law, re-educated our consciences—has displayed in the unmerited and voluntary sufferings of His Son the inviolability of moral order. It is as thoroughly penetrated with these ideas that we have been led towards pardon, which is itself, as pardon, a consecration of the law ; and it is at the foot of the very cross, that teaches us justice, that we have learned what love ought to be ; for is it not thence that the sacred words echo within our hearts, ‘ The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead ; and that He died for all, that they who live should not live unto themselves ? ’ Thus it is in the soil of justice that love has sprung up, and it is from this soil that it will eternally draw the sap which rises into its branches and covers them with blossom and fruit.”

As Vinet finds the roots of Christian character in conscience, so he places the end and consummation of it in love to God and life in Christ. The Christianity of formal observance, the Christianity which consists in conformity to certain regulations with a view to a certain reward in happiness, is for him no true Christianity. “ I am as much bent,” he says, “ upon disavowing utilitarian Christianity as on defending Christian utilitarianism. . . . There has gradually risen up under the very shadow of the vital doctrines of the Gospel, and under the form of a severe and vigilant orthodoxy, a Christianity which is nothing but a theory of happiness, and a system of personal security. There are Christians who in Christianity have mistaken the starting-point for the goal, and the means for the end, and who, instead of proceeding from happiness to love, stop short at happiness—interpreting, to the dishonour of Christianity, and their own shame, that the ‘ work of God ’ (or the work according to God) ‘ is to believe in him whom He has sent.’ . . . The happiness even of being loved would be incomplete without that of loving ; and if the charity of God be infinitely precious to man, it is so, be sure, as giving him scope, and, as it were, constraining him to return love for love. The climax of God’s grace, the last word of His love, the summary of the Gospel, the end for us of the work of redemption, is not to be loved : it is to love ! ”

FRANCE.

CORONATION OF STATUES OF THE VIRGIN.

It is curious to observe the various practices to which the Ultramontane party now have recourse, in order to revive or confirm the devotion of their flocks. Whilst the ‘atheists, the Materialists, and other adversaries of the Christian Church, multiply their attacks upon the fundamental truths of the Gospel, the priests find nothing better to do than to revert to the grossest superstitions. They do not appeal to the understanding or the conscience of the people, but labour to influence the ignorant, and to inflame their imagination by pompous shows.

I know not how far this method can produce any wide-spread or durable results. In any event, it proves that the defenders of the Romish communion have, in our age, fallen very low. Bossuet, Pascal, and Fenelon defended their faith by the aid of learning and of logic ; but their successors, apparently hopeless of victory on such ground, have substituted for logical arguments mere outward forms and puerile ceremonies. Amongst other practices of this sort, I may refer to worldly! The faith of the Catholics must be greatly weakened, since the clergy are constrained to use such means to maintain the custom of pilgrimages.

We remark, lastly, with deep regret, that the concourse of so many persons of both sexes is by no means favourable to good morals. It is clearly proved that these pilgrimages are accompanied by every species of disorder. Would not the Romish clergy do well to renounce them? Alas! they obstinately preserve all those ancient superstitions which serve to maintain sacerdotal tyranny.

SPANISH CUSTOMS IN FRANCE.

I must here refer to another and very deplorable fact, which ought to find mention in our correspondence, since it involves moral interests—this is the introduction of bull-fights into our country. All are conversant with the customs of Spain for long generations. There the people attend these bloody spectacles with passionate enthusiasm. This sport is somewhat analogous to the horrible games of the circus in ancient Rome. The poor animals are attacked, wounded, and butchered by the torsadors, and the spectators applaud with frenzy these barbarous representations. Their delight is in proportion to the blood shed in these encounters. Sometimes even human beings succumb in the struggle, and the ferocious joy of the spectators is then still further augmented. Until quite recently the French have abstained from imitating this detestable custom of the Spaniards, but within the last few months the state of things has changed. Bullfights have taken place at Bayonne, Nîmes, Arles, Beaucaire, and the project has even been entertained of introducing them into Paris; so that France would copy Spain in one of its worst habits. Generally, however—and I am happy to state the fact—public opinion has energetically condemned this imitation of Spanish manners. The most respectable organs of the press have affirmed that our country would be dishonoured by it. Nevertheless, Government continues to authorise, especially in Southern France, these atrocious exhibitions; and fearful accidents have taken place. Some of the spectators have been victims, from the animals having escaped or broken the barriers in their fits of rage. Let us hope that such scenes will shortly be suppressed. The French nation should have more regard for its dignity.

UNCERTAINTY FELT IN RESPECT OF THE FRANCO-ROMAN QUESTION.

Great indecision and obscurity surround

the relations of the Government of Napoleon III. with the Court of Rome. The Franco-Italian Convention has now been concluded one year. It is stipulated in that official document that the French garrison shall quit the Pontifical territory at the end of two years. Thus the time is now approaching when the Vatican will be left to its own resources, face to face with the citizens of Rome and Italy. Nevertheless, the Pope and his cardinals seem to remain systematically silent and inert, as if they had nothing to fear! Our Government, on its part, says nothing, and hides its resolutions for the future with a thick veil.

What does all this import? Will not the convention of September 15 be carried out? This would be an unpardonable inconsistency. Since Napoleon III. has made a direct and solemn treaty with Victor Emmanuel, he must faithfully observe it, under pain of forfeiting his word and his reputation. But what will become of the temporal crown of Pius IX., if our troops should be recalled without his having taken any measures for the defence of his authority? The whole affair is, indeed, a mystery.

The Ultramontane journals announce that the Pope intends to convoke, in the middle of next year, all the bishops of the Roman Church, in order to celebrate the eighteenth secular jubilee of the martyrdom of the apostle St. Peter at Rome. This would furnish a pretext for constituting a sort of oecumenical council, and obtaining a grand demonstration in favour of the Papacy. But will Napoleon III. authorise the French bishops to take part in an assembly which would excite so much agitation, and perhaps serious troubles, in the Roman Catholic world? This, again, is a doubtful question. We must await the events that are approaching. The Italian Government continues to pursue a liberal course, and will not shrink back from the great duties which devolve upon it.

PROGRESS OF EVANGELIZATION.

I will conclude by referring to the labours of the Evangelical Society established in the north of France. The committee recently called a general meeting, and presented a report of its proceedings. The results are satisfactory and delightful. Itinerant preachers have instructed the populations, and contributed, under the Lord's blessing, towards confirming the weak, enlightening the ignorant, and converting the worldly. Mr. Dawes, of London, who was present at this gathering, exhorted the brethren to redouble their piety stantly filling the hotels, but numbers of the citizens of Paris are absent, seeking recreation amid mountains and valleys, on lakes or rivers. As a consequence, there is just now a general stagnation in the political world, and a similar dearth of news and of work seems to mark the world ecclesiastical also. There is accordingly less than usual to report this month from the capital ; but some items of intelligence which may interest your readers reach us from the provinces.

In the department of l'Ariège, near Toulouse, there are some communes in which a large proportion of the population are Protestants, who had been accustomed to live on terms of harmony with their Catholic neighbours. Not long ago, there arrived in the neighbourhood of Mas d'Azil a fanatical Romanist missionary from Toulouse, whose addresses had the effect of inflaming the Catholic population of neighbouring communes. Availing himself of the excitement thus created, he commenced by planting the crucifix in the principal place in the village of Gabres, inhabited by old Protestant families, and possessing a church for their worship. Without any authorisation, the missionary priest seized on this ground, which was public property, in spite of the remonstrances of the Mayor of Gabres, the inhabitants of which place, almost without exception Protestant, had to submit to the ceremonies of the inauguration of the aforesaid crucifix, their only help being to bring the affair before the tribunal of Pamiers, and await the decision of the court. This success emboldened the Romanists, and they soon proceeded to make another aggressive movement

L'ABBÉ C. A. DUGUEY.

It is an opportunity for those who, with faith and piety, believe that the gift of God purchased with money, and who are encouraged by the words once addressed to the rich: "Thy money perish with thee."
It has sometimes been arrested in extending a new neighbourhood by the unexpecting uprooting of some remarkable feature of the earth's crust. It had been for ages ; but, by some strange contact has been thrown up, with all its a bygone period, in the midst of all the changes of the world that now is. How strange sometimes does the contrast appear—the relics of an ancient world amidst the fair flowers and foliage of the modern earth!

And to us who have been reared amidst the happy scenes of a Christian and Protestant home, with all its light, and liberty, and truth, equally incongruous do these memorials of other ages appear, when the fossilised strata, which we would desire to be for ever buried in the depths, thus obtrude themselves to view.

THE RATIONALIST CONTROVERSY.

The marrow of this controversy, which still is raging in the Reformed Church, may be found in a pamphlet lately published by M.
Frédéric de Coninck, of Havre, a pious layman of Evangelical principles. It consists of a series of letters, addressed to M. Pastor Martin Paschoud, in reference to articles which have lately appeared in the Disciple de Jesus Christ. These letters are distinguished by brilliancy and originality, which prove M. de Coninck a most able and skilful master of the art of controversy. The grand matter of debate is thus succinctly stated, and the ground narrowed to the smallest limits.
The Rationalist alleges "that every pastor of the Reformed Church of France has a right to deliver from the pulpit his own personal faith, whatever it may be, even if it differ from, or be entirely opposed to, the doctrine of the Church." The Orthodox, on the other hand, maintains that "the Church of France (as every other church of necessity must) holds certain positive doctrines which alone can be taught in its name, and which the Church, by its constitution, is bound to respect."

The synonym which the "Liberal" Churchman gives us for Protestantism is the right of free inquiry. "Assuredly," replies
M. de Coninck, "I am the advocate of the greatest liberty of thought and investigation ;
but, in my apprehension, freedom of inquiry is in itself no more a religion or a church than the square of the hypotenuse is geometry. Free inquiry is a method which permits every one to determine for himself, without the dictation of another, the doctrines which appear to him in harmony with truth, and the church to which he consequently desires to attach himself by his free choice. But surely the right of free inquiry does not authorise any pastor to overthrow the positive doctrines on which the church of his own voluntary adoption is built—the church which he has entered because he deems it most in harmony with the truth of God. This freedom of thought and choice to his private judgment, has discovered that there is truer harmony to be eluded from the saxehorn than from the human voice!"

This is but a specimen of the originality and pungency of the brochure of M. de Coninck. The words of the illustrious Guizot are true, "The flag of Protestantism has inscribed upon it 'The right of private judgment.' Protestantism is born of free inquiry—it is its cradle, it is its standard—a standard which it will never abandon." But to place at the base of a church, as such, the right of private judgment as its only foundation, M. de Coninck shows, is to build on the shifting sand. He contends that the confessions of faith of that Church to which he is attached are something more than a mere monument of what is venerable from antiquity, and decrepit as venerable, and that the right of inquiry does not apply to those who have professed their firm consent and assent to such formularies. "If the changes which three centuries must necessarily bring," says he, "in manners, customs, and language, have caused some minor opinions of our fathers to fall into desuetude, the Liturgy of the Reformed Church still exists to prove that the essential elements remain, and that this Church is become neither Deistical nor Pantheistical, nor Unitarian, because it may have ceased to uphold all the dogmas of predestination once embraced. The Civil Code has not ceased to exist because this or that enactment of secondary importance is no longer observed."

"A man from whom I needed a Bible, replied to me for a long while, and will let you have it cheap, it, inquiring, when he had wished to part with it. The last time he was at church taken his text from the Book of Job, he had proved that a miracle was false, and the conclusion was that the other miracles were false also. 'When I was the mouth of a pastor, I was sent to be our teacher, and I have made me believe a book of such fables? My old father said that the Bible had deceived me, that it was the Word of God before breathing his last, and I read to me a verse which was the fly-leaf of the book. See, I read the verse of the 3rd of John,' read the verse, and, after he had read it, he replied, 'I understand that who does not believe in Jesus Christ to save us do not believe there is a God, and I do not admit of such a thing.' He exclaimed the poor wife, husband causes me! He said, 'What will our children be?'

THE FREE CHURCHES.

The Evangelical Society of France has recently published its annual report of operations. This institution is, in fact, a home missionary society, supported and managed by the Independent Churches; that is to say, independent of State control. Its object is the diffusion of Evangelical truth in France. It affords aid to some twelve pastors, nine evangelists, and thirty-five teachers. The Evangelical Society of Geneva is another institution with similar objects, and makes France part of the sphere of its operations, having not less than thirty stations supported by its funds. There is another society of a voluntary character connected with the Reformed (Established) Church, the object of which is similar, and which aids in the reaching of the Gospel in about 120 places in France and Algeria. Its name is the Central Protestant Society of Evangelization. It is refreshing to remember in how many places in this land where superstition and infidelity have fearful and preponderating influence the pure truth is being proclaimed from week to week in districts where, but for these sister societies, the sound of the Gospel would be unheard. The reports of each of these institutions record many instances of encouragement and success, set off, as may be expected, by many a difficulty and trial of faith and patience. Will Christians in England remember the faithful witnesses of Christ in this land in their fervent prayers? Amidst all the missions to far distant lands, let not the country geographically nearest to our own be forgotten.

Many of the self-sustaining Free Churches of France are united in a confederation neither strictly Presbyterian nor strictly Congregational. It is named the Union of the Evangelical Churches of France, and originated in 1849, on the refusal of the National Reformed Church of France to recognise the divinity of Christ as a fundamental article of its faith. The lamented Frédéric Monod was for many years the president of this Union. The last biennial synod, it will be remembered, was held in Paris, in November last, on which occasion thirty-two churches were represented by their pastors and deputies. The meeting of the south-eastern branch of this Union has just been held, formed by the ten Evangelical churches of Lozère, Gard, Hérault, and the Bouches du Rhône. The meeting took place at St. Jean du Gard, and the accounts furnished of its proceedings are of considerable interest, but your space will not admit of a report.

SWITZERLAND.

TERCENTENARY COMMEMORATION OF FAREL AT NEUFCHÂTEL.

Neufchâtel, September 14.

The three-hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Reformer, William Farel, was celebrated yesterday in our ancient little town, which was the centre of his almost apostolical activity for the last thirty years of his life. A preparatory prayer-meeting had been held the evening before. Early in the morning of the 14th the clergy of the National Church of this canton, the Dissenting ministers, many laymen, some English visitors, and delegates from the principal churches of France and Switzerland, in which Farel had laboured, assembled in the Town-hall, and proceeded in a solemn procession to the Collegiate Church. We passed the fountain upon the basis of which the intrepid Reformer had taken his stand in 1530, when he first came to Neufchâtel, and preached to the people in the market-place at the hazard of his life. We then wound up a steep hill to the church, to which an enthusiastic crowd had broken some years later, bearing the preacher along with them, or rather carrying him, and putting him into the pulpit, after having broken the altar and the images of the saints to pieces.

After an excellent service, conducted by Pastor Ladame, the meeting adjourned to the terrace of the Castle, which had once been a cemetery, and in some unknown corner of which the ashes of the Reformer lie. Here letters were read from the Reformed Churches of Metz, in Lorraine, and of Gap, in Dauphiny, the latter the birthplace of Farel. Both churches regretted their inability to send a deputation to the festival, but approved highly of it, saying that, with the experience of Rome before our eyes, there was no fear of our exaggerating the honours due to the man of God; our children would never come to say, "Saint Farel, pray for us!" Then the deputies from Paris, Berne, Geneva, Vaud, &c., spoke. Dr. Merle d'Aubigné reminded us that Farel was also the first Reformer of Geneva, and that it was afterwards to him that Geneva owed Calvin's determination to take up his abode within its walls. Other Genevese delegates reminded us of Farel's journey on foot, when advanced in age, to sit on the necessity of uniting all our efforts against the superstition, the rationalism, and the materialism of the age.

The company dined in our miniature House of Commons, in the Castle, the most cordial and expansive spirit reigning around the festive board. After dinner there was a pilgrimage to Serrières, a village about a mile from Neufchâtel, where Farel preached from a stone outside the church in 1529, and where the first French Bible was printed by Olivetan, at the expense of the Waldenses, in 1535. A copy of this edition was exhibited in the parish church, and one of the bystanders was a descendant of its printer.

The proceedings of the day ended by a sermon preached by Pastor Grandpierre, of Paris, and it was determined that we should show our gratitude to Farel's native district in Dauphiny by sending an evangelist to make a missionary excursion there.

In anticipation of the Farel commemoration, the following interesting article appeared in L'Espérance (Paris) of September 1, from the pen of Pastor H. Blanc, jun. :—

Our readers will, doubtless, remember the notice inserted in this journal some weeks ago with reference to the three-hundredth anniversary of the death of Farel. The time has now arrived when, in a solemn manner, the Church at Neufchâtel will recall what God wrought for her through the ministry of this faithful servant of the truth. The 13th of September will be a day of recollection and prayer for our brethren in that part of Switzerland—a day on which, after the lapse of three centuries, it will be manifested to the eyes of the world that the edifice of the Reformation still stands, and that the spirit of Farel is not extinct.

By birth, education, character, and the gift of was not and is not so far. The fall of the Papacy in many degrees, for one shock did

But to be brief, his conversion was gradual. Some of him echoing with tears the words—“Too late I have known loved thee!”

Paris was not a favourable place for as such were the truths then looked upon, and ere long accompanied by Farel and his companions in exile he had to impose silence upon and to seek in Meaux an asylum accorded by Bishop and his companions in exile. Farel was then thirty; and woolcombers, celebrated that the Christian activity former was first exercised. we find in him the germ courage and unflagging energy. He subsequently gave so many proofs of the Parliament of Paris to capital Farel and all his associates. Meaux soon took umbrage at the happy bishop, himself suspected no longer afford protection and sheltered. Farel, imperiously devised no better plan than to flee to capital, and there to exercise concealment in the very den of the imagined, Paris was not to remain long in peace. Persecuted, he was soon compelled to occur to him to seek to land. Accordingly he began his work at Gap. But thither his fame followed, destined him for another asylum by the hatred of the great difficulty that he succeeded in escaping with his run the greatest risks—by hiding himself in woods and last set foot in the land of the morning of the year 1524. It colampadius, then in the country of Montliard, where he distributed by hundreds copies the New Testament, sent him by the printer ugris. Obligated to withdraw from thence on account of an imprudence into which he had been won by his ardent nature (he had snatched the hands of a priest a relic that was carried in ceremony, and had thrown it far away), he fled to Strasburg, to Bucer and Capiton, and it was not till 1526 that he entered French Switzerland, which God had destined to be the sphere of his most important work of his life.

The Cantons of Vaud, Geneva, Neuchâtel, the Bernese Jura, were then strongholds of Catholicism. Four Romish bishops, aided by their monks, set themselves with their whole might to resist the encroachments of the Reformation on their territory. Farel's first attempt at Neuchâtel was not happy. He attempted to ascend a pulpit, dressed as a priest, but he was discovered, and obliged to make a hasty retreat from a city where, at a later period, he was to fulfil a ministry of twenty-eight years.

It was if the time had not yet come for Neuchâtel, because other churches needed the aid of him. At Aigle, under the name of Master Ursin, he established himself for the winter of 1526-27, there, after innumerable obstacles, he had the joy of seeing the Reformation fully accepted, and of aiding in the surrounding districts. From that time he began to reap the fruit of his labours.

The year following, January, 1528, we meet him at Berne, taking part in the memorable convocation in which 358 ecclesiastics and a crowd of laymen agreed, after an earnest examination, to proclaim the abolition of the Mass, and an acceptance of the Reformation.

At last, in December, 1529, the Reformer was secretly landed in a fishing-boat at the village of Serrières, near Neuchâtel.

Farel had just entered the port, and, at first sight, great seemed the difficulties he had to face. The State of Neuchâtel was then governed by the Countess Jeanne de Hochberg, who, assisted by her relative, the Lord of Prangins, and a council of canons, was firmly resolved to resist every attempt at Reformation. But God confounds the projects of men, and the first ally of Farel was none other than the Curé of Serrières. This worthy priest, Emer Beynon, had a drawing of the Gospel. He received his visitor with joy, and declared that if he was prohibited from preaching within the church, nothing should prevent his preaching before the church. A congregation was assembled in the churchyard, and, in the absence of a pulpit, Farel stood upon a stone, which piety has preserved to this day, as a memorial of this first sermon.

Great was the excitement of Neuchâtel. They debated, they deliberated, and while the canons were consulting together upon the means of putting down such abuses, Farel, invited by the Countess, entered that Romish city, and preached in the market cross to the people who gathered in all parts to hear him. The sonorous voice, the eloquence, the intense belief of the Reformer produced an immense effect. The cause of the Reformation was gained at the first blow. "Salvation, grace, and peace be to you," wrote he to his friend William Dumoulin; "I would have you ignorant, dearly beloved, of what God has wrought for His people."

his work advanced with gigantic strides. Soon it was no longer in the streets that he preached. They forced him to the church—it was there he must proclaim the Gospel; and beneath the vaulted roof of the church of Notre Dame resounded the eloquent strains of the preacher. There, says the chronicle, Farel delivered one of the most powerful sermons that he ever preached, and when he had ceased speaking, voices responded from all parts of the assembly, "We will follow the Evangelical religion; we and our children will live and die by it."

The Reformation was, in fact, established at Neuchâtel. The enemies of Protestantism, availing themselves of some disorders committed by the populace in destroying images and dispersing processions in honour of the Host, have maintained that the establishment of the Reformation was a revolutionary work. Facts disprove this assertion. A few days later, in the presence of the deputies from Berne, the people of Neuchâtel assembled at the Castle solemnly to testify by a vote their firm resolution. Carefully distinguishing between liberty of conscience and the rights of the civil authority, the inhabitants declared their "desire to be good and faithful citizens to Madame, and to serve her till death, save only in regard to the Evangelical faith, in which they would live and die."

We must pass over a period of six-and-twenty years, during which Farel did not remain inactive. He organised a church, founded a school for catechumens, established a severe system of discipline, took part in the foundation of the Academy of Lausanne and the College of Neuchâtel; and in 1535 he superintended the printing of a translation of the Holy Scriptures by Olivétan. Always an active missionary, he now and then left his work as an organiser to resume for a while the staff of a travelling apostle. And now, faithful even unto the end, we find him in his old age awaiting in his humble manse the summons of his Lord to enter into rest. On the 13th of September, 1565, Farel peacefully fell asleep in the bosom of that church which God had granted to him to found and to see grow so as to survive him.

It is the anniversary of this death that the descendants and successors of Farel are preparing to celebrate. The Synod of Neuchâtel has issued a circular inviting other churches to join with the Church at Neuchâtel in yielding hearty thanks to God for what this faithful servant of Christ was enabled to accomplish in the 16th century. In a spirit of Christian brotherhood which we rejoice to record, the Church of Neuchâtel has determined to address all the churches which may be considered as sister churches, because spiritual daughters of Farel, or who directly co-operated in his work, as those of Basle and Berne, and to invite them to unite around his tomb, not for the purpose of canonising a new saint, but in order to glorify with one heart and one voice the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has caused His Word to come down to us for the healing of the Church.

The Reformed Church of Paris, where Farel began his career as a Reformer, could not be as a foreigner at this festival. To the fraternal invitation of the Church of Neuchâtel the Paris Consistory has responded by delegating, as the representative of the Church at Paris, M. Grandpierre, originally of Neuchâtel, who is charged in addition, by the Commission of the Synod of his lost, has just published its third annual report. Forty young women, during the past twelve months, have been under the care of the committee, and of these the majority appear to have been permanently reclaimed.

The report concludes with an energetic and forcible appeal to the sympathy of the Christian public, an appeal which, we should think, would meet with a cordial response.

ITALY.

SUPPRESSION OF THE RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

A Turin telegram states that the Minister of the Interior, in a circular to the prefects relative to the approaching elections, announces that shortly after the assembling of Parliament the Ministry will bring forward a measure for the suppression of religious bodies and the re-adjustment of ecclesiastical property. This measure will ameliorate the position of the clergy in the country districts. In the division of the ecclesiastical wealth, a portion will be assigned to elementary and middle-class education, and a portion to the communes where the religious bodies resided, for works of public utility and for educational purposes. The Ministry will also bring forward bills for reforming the system of primary, secondary, and superior instruction.

PALERMO AND SANTA ROSALIA.

A correspondent of the Nazione of Florence, writing from Palermo, gives a lively sketch of moral progress among the Sicilians. This sketch we reproduce in a somewhat condensed form. May other superstitions elsewhere fall as speedily into merited oblivion as that of the once popular Santa Rosalia of Palermo!

If the Nazione had existed before 1859, and had had its own correspondent at Palermo, to-day would have been to him a day of happiness; for the mere description of the festival would have been enough for three or four columns. Setting out with the procession of the 15th July, 1624, while the plague was raging, ordered by the most eminent the Cardinal Gianettino Doria, and in which the priests and friars of Palermo, of every hue and of every order, mendicants or minor monks, shod and barefoot, took part, the correspondent would not have failed to tell how it came into the mind of one of the singers in the procession (for they shouted the litanies, and the whole roll of saints was exhausted) to invoke yet again Santa Rosalia, and, touching the singer at his side, and agreeing to do so, they cried out, and a myriad voices responded in chorus, "Sancta Rosalia, ora pro nobis."

who had laboured more than thirty days in the grotto in which the saint had lived, on Mount Pellegrino, to find the bones, came to a piece of granite, and then gradually uncovered a skull, and then a whole skeleton, there deposited by angels' hands, and secretly preserved, until the moment had come to take it out, in order, by bearing it in procession and adoring it, to put a stop to the great disaster which had befallen the city of Palermo. Here he would have told how, while among the doctors of the Church and of medicine it was still disputed whether these were the bones of Santa Rosalia or not, she, who was little pleased with the doubt, and had pity on Palermo, which was daily wasted by pestilence, appeared as a fair little lady to one Signor Bonelli, and ordered him to tell the cardinals that she was annoyed that the miracles she had done already (among which was that of delivering from death five women in childbed who had swallowed some dust from the grotto) did not convince the unbelieving—that the bones were her own bones, but that the plague would not cease till they were borne in procession with great pomp through all Palermo.

All these facts established, which nobody would have questioned, the correspondent of 1858 might have set about describing the festivals which then began, and annually followed one another, costing the municipality about 100,000 lire [3,333*l.*, if the lire be taken at 8*d.*] in five days. And who knows what magnificent periods would have described that famous car, as high as the highest balconies of Palermo, drawn by sixty oxen, which went through the streets, sinking into the roads, knocking against the terraces, and injuring the fronts of some; a truly triumphal car, all carved, painted and gemmed, and decked with velvet, brocade, and gold, the highest effort of the city architects, who are now taken up instead with watercourses and roads; a car where sat majestically the city magnates in ample robes of velvet and silk, in all their pomp, while the city band played merrily; a car followed by a hundred constables, guards, equeuries, and valets, and a countless crowd. Then he would have described the all, the grand mass which was performed at the Martyrs' Church, where the King or his representative, by an old privilege of the kings of Sicily, was wont to appear as the equal of Jesus Christ, and stand during the elevation with head covered, while all others bowed upon their knees, and finally salute the divinity by drawing the sword. To conclude, he would have recorded how all the festivals of Santa Rosalia ended with a grand procession, which began in the evening, and finished, perhaps, the next day, and during which they carried the saint herself, through every corner, through every street, through every house, dancing it about an infernal dance, and drinking its health like an ancient bacchante, or something worse, of our own times.

Such a letter must have been written by your correspondent in 1858 ; but, unluckily, your correspondent of 1865 has no such fine opportunity of exhibiting his powers of description, displaying his learning, and edifying everybody. Before reporting the festivals he is forced to ask where they are gone to.

What now remains of all the festivities of Santa Rosalia ? A vesper, a mass, and a procession ; things which exist this year, preserved as a religious memorial, but will perhaps next year be forgotten. Whither is gone the monstrous car which was drawn through Palermo by sixty oxen ? Where is the prætor in his robe and brocade ? Where are the hundreds of constables, guards, drums, servants, and priests ? What has been done with their rich vestments, their silver maces, and their embroidery of velvet and gold ? What has become of the silver coffin wherein

Wherefore, over against all these things of the middle ages, Palermo sets the rapid progress of its new life, the schools already established, the railroads, the banks, the telegraphs, the free streets, associations, free speech, free studies, free government, and all that mass of institutions and advantages which liberty alone can give.

Palermo does not regret those festivals, then, above all, because it recollects that the governors who ruled it when there were many festivals and little bread, always followed both the one and the other with many gibbets.

POPISH PROCESSIONS.

The Nazione of Florence says: "We believe we can assert that the Minister of the Interior, wisely designing to prevent the renewal of the disorders which in some parts of the kingdom have been shown to arise from public religious performances, has ordered that henceforth processions in the public streets cannot take place without previous licence from the civil authority, which will be able to prohibit them as often as there be reason to fear a disturbance of public order. Suitable instructions to this effect will have been sent to all the local effects."

ANARCHY IN THE PAPAL COURT.

A letter from Rome in the daily journals presents the "situation" there as "getting very serious." And, as a "house divided against itself shall not stand," the end must be near. The revolution has broken out among the "mendicant orders," and arrests have been made "among the secular priests." It appears that the Capucins have an enormous convent at Rome, which, by a bull of Urban VIII., belongs to the Roman province—i.e., only the Capucins of Rome have the right of residence there. By abuse it came to be regarded as a convent for the general order, and the Father-General, without consulting the Chapter, obtained a Papal brief converting the convent formally into a general convent. This aroused the indignant protest of the monks, who took very strong means of indicating their displeasure to the Father-General. The retraction of the brief was strongly urged by petition to the Pope, but he supported the Father-General. The war of words came at length to acts, several Capucins being suspended, whilst others were arrested and sent to distant monasteries—measures not calculated to calm the agitation.

A few days ago Major Eligi, of the gendarmes, the right hand of Monsignor de Merode, arrested the Father Custodian of the Capucins in the open street. The person of the Father Custodian is, in the eyes of the monks and of the people, sacred and inviolable. To lay hands upon him in the open street was to declare war against the whole order of the seraphic patriarch of Assisi. The Father Custodian, on being arrested by Major Eligi, turned upon him and said, haughtily, "You, the agent of the Pontifical Government, you dare to lay your hand on one of the children of the poor of God?" The Major begged him to enter a carriage. The Custodian replied, "Like our father, St. Francis, I always go on foot." He then called upon Major Eligi to show him his order of arrest, when the latter produced a letter from Monsignor Stella, one of the secret chamberlains of the Pope, ordering him, in the name of his Holiness, to arrest the Father Custodian. The Capucin smiled, and said, "I pity the Pope. Take me to prison, but walk before me, for no Custodian of the Capucins has ever known the way. Besides, a poor frate may follow you or precede you, but you will never dare to walk side by side with him." This arrest has had a tremendous effect throughout the order of St. Francis. The Capucins, the Franciscans, the recolleti, are highly indignant with the Pope and his Government, and they look upon the Father Custodian as a sort of Fra Jacopone da Todi, the victim of Boniface VIII. A Franciscan has also been arrested—Father Barnabas, author of a work on the "End of the World," and of a Christian romance, "Prisca," in the style of Cardinal Wiseman's "Fabiola." In the midst of the excitement caused by these arrests, the Father-Provincial of the Capucins of Rome returned from his hiding-place at Civita Vecchia, and, suddenly changing his attitude, took part with the malcontents. He even resolved to convoke the Chapter of the Capucins of all the Roman province in order to make a collective protest against Pius IX.'s brief, and to depose the Father-General. But the Pontifical Government had been well informed, and the Chapter had no sooner assembled than it was dissolved by the intervention of the police. The monks who had arrived from the country were all sent back to their respective convents, some by the railway, some in private carriages. The Capucins residing at Rome then resolved to draw up a protest against the proceedings of the Pope, and to get it signed by all the mendicant orders, so as to give the widest possible significance to an act which would have proceeded from the Chapter of the Capucins alone, had not that Chapter been dissolved. The protest is now being circulated in all the convents of Rome. One result of the agitation has been that the Pope has thought it prudent to release the Custodian, Father Felix, of Frascati, who had been shut up in the house of detention for ecclesiastics near the Angelica Gate. He has been expelled, however, from Rome. Summoned before Monsignor Svegliati, Secretary of the Congregation of Bishops, Father Felix spoke in the most violent manner against the Pope. Three Capucins, friends of the Custodian, have been expelled with him; and, one by one, the chief malcontents are being sent away to distant convents. It is believed that the Pope means to get rid of all the Capucins belonging to the Roman province, and to replace them by foreigners. The irritation of these monks is extreme. They declaim against the Holy Father with all that Republican boldness which is the distinctive characteristic of the followers of St. Francis of Assisi, and which is natural to men who have nothing to lose, and are consequently superior to all those considerations which influence men governed by material interests. The mendicant orders in general, bound to the Capucins by all the ties of brotherhood, sympathize with them and support them in their resistance to the Papal Government. The monks are passing in large numbers into the ranks of the opposition. They talk loudly of the necessity of a reconciliation between Rome and the Italian Kingdom, and of a general reorganization of the Roman Government; and the more imprudent of them say plainly that they desire the end of a reign which the majority of the prelates also find too long, because it opens no field to their ambition.

Thus far in relation to the monks. And, we are told, this "cloister revolution" has been followed by a strike among the parish priests. The legal amount of alms payable for one mass had been fixed by a bull of Pius the VII. at fifteen baiocchi. Custom increased this sum by one-third; and a papetto (twenty baiocchi) is the usual sum to offer to a priest on asking him to celebrate a mortuary mass, or mass of any kind. The priests made an appeal for a modification of the regulation of Pius VII. in their favour, and the Pope at first countenanced, but afterwards (irritated at the attitude of the Capucins) rejected their application. The priests are said to be "much enraged with the Pope for refusing to issue a bull fixing the legal charge for a mass at thirty or thirty-five baiocchi." And this is the Church which boasts of its unity, in contrast to the "variations of Protestantism."

EMANCIPATION SOCIETY.

It is said that the "Emancipation Society" in Southern Italy has formed 24 auxiliaries for the several Italian provinces. Its members at present consist of 971 priests, 852 laymen, and 340 honorary members; 1,823 persons in all. Among the 971 priests are 102 cures and 40 high dignitaries of the Church. Among the laymen are three ex-Ministers of the Kingdom of Italy, 36 deputies, and 11 senators. It is announ-that—

1. The only and invariable object of Emancipation Association of the Italian clergy, by means of its teaching and example bring the principles of the true faith and Catholic doctrine to bear on the conscience the faithful.

2. To explain to the masses the respective rights and duties of the Sovereign Pontiff, of clergy, and of the people.

3. To bring about an œcumenical council, the disciplinary reform of the Catholic Church in accordance with the requirements of advanced civilisation of Christian nations, to make the necessity of this thoroughly understood.

Father Prota, the director of the Association, has lately issued a memorandum, which the ideas of the liberal clergy defined—

1. The Pope, Bishop of Rome, and Primate of the Universal Church, the Œcumenical Council under the presidency of the Pope, to be supreme judge in matters of faith.

2. Restoration to the bishops, archbishops and metropolitans of the rights which they possessed up to the eleventh century.

3. Full establishment of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and free exercise of voting by clergy and people in the election of bishops, and of the Sovereign Pontiff himself.

4. Liturgy in the national language, and circulation of the Bible.

5. Free sacramental confession on the part of the penitent faithful, and according to the canons of the third and fourth centuries, as far as regards sacerdotal jurisdiction.

6. Restitution to priests of every class of consultative and deliberative vote in the diocesan and provincial synods.

7. Abolition of forced celibacy.

8. Admission of full and entire liberty of conscience, and formal renunciation of every doctrine of compulsion.

We regret to learn that societies of free thinkers have been formed in Sienna, Pisa, and Milan, and will doubtless soon be formed in other cities. All revealed religion is rejected. Atheists, as well as deists; spiritualists, as well as materialists; pantheists, as well as nihilists, are admitted members;—in short, any man proving himself to be independent as regards his convictions.

PROTESTANTISM IN ELBA.

Although the principal facts in the following communication have from time to time been noticed in these pages, our readers will doubtless be glad to have the whole of the interesting particulars in one continuous narrative:—

In the year 1855 a small vessel from the island of Elba, laden with charcoal, entered the port of Nice. The captain—Cignoni—and his brother, who was with him, were of the lower class which, with few exceptions, forms the population of Elba. These men were highly esteemed by their compatriots for integrity of character, for strict observance of their religious duties, and for their strong attachment to the Roman Catholic Church.

At the time alluded to, Francesco and Rosa Madiai (so well known from their trials and offerings in Tuscany for the truth's sake) were settled in Nice, and they had there the management of the Bible depot, under the British and Foreign Bible Society. One day Francesco, walking near the port, overheard a group of sailors conversing in his own native language. He accosted them, and asked them to purchase a Bible. Cignoni, who was the sailor he addressed, replied that he "knew nothing of the Bible, not even exactly what it was." "It is the Word of God," replied Madiai, "will you not take it?" Cignoni, after some hesitation, bought it. A little further conversation on the subject followed, without, however, much apparent result. The Bible was taken to Elba, where Cignoni showed it to a friend—a poor mason of the name of Quattrini. At first neither the brothers Cignoni nor the mason found much to interest them in the book, which Cignoni, on his next voyage from the island, consigned to the care of Quattrini. Soon afterwards, this poor man, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, was induced to "search the Scriptures." He became deeply interested in their perusal; he prayed for light; and his eyes were opened to behold the Sun of Righteousness. God blessed the simple reading of the Word to his conversion. No human instrumentality was employed in his case.

In the meanwhile, the brothers Cignoni made repeated trips to Nice to sell their charcoal. When there, they sought out the Madiai, who invited them to join their meetings for reading the Bible. The Gospel was expounded to them, and thus were the Madiai instrumental in communicating to these islanders the good news of a free salvation through faith in the Lord Jesus. At this period religious persecution in Tuscany (to which Elba belonged) was rampant. The Cignoni, Quattrini, and a few friends they had induced to join them, met to read in secret the Word of God; the precious book was concealed by them sometimes in a pit in Quattrini's garden, sometimes in a hole made in the wall of his house; and so fearful were they of its being discovered and taken from them, that they dared not intrust even their own relatives with their dangerous secret. At last, from time to time, they spoke of the Word to friends, who at last joined them in reading and prayer.

His went on for six years, and even when Government persecution ceased, and a certain degree of religious liberty was granted, the Elba converts were long ere they could decide to make a public avowal of their faith. At last, however, after an inward conflict and prayer, the step was taken. Then persecution awaited them, more awful, perhaps, to them, than would have been if they had been disclosed or exiled. The disclosure of their change of religion was received by their countrymen with scorn and execration. Members of their own families and their dearest friends deserted them. Scorned by all by whom they had hitherto been respected and loved, their very lives were threatened; twice was Cignoni's house set on fire by his old friends and neighbours, doubtless at the instigation of the infuriated priests. Nothing daunted or shaken by these outrages, these brave confessors put their trust in God, who never fails to help all those who do so.

The "Evangelici," as they call themselves, then sent to Florence to ask to have an evangelist. Two or three in succession were sent to them by different parties; one of them was re-conducted to Porto Ferrajo by gendarmes; others were driven shamefully away by the populace. Gregori, a young student in the Vaudois College at Florence, stood his ground manfully, and by him the Elba mission was really established. When he left to continue his theological studies at the expiration of the vacation, Emile Marchand, a young Frenchman, succeeded him.

This was in 1862; three different stations were soon established in different parts of the island, and Sunday, adult, evening, and weekly schools commenced. M. Marchand was received with great joy by the converts at Rio Marina, where the Cignoni and Quattrini reside, and where the work began. He at once opened "an upper room" for holding meetings, which for months had to be guarded by the police during the hours the brethren assembled, to prevent the forced entrance of the angry mob that assembled round the house with shouts and menaces; in spite of which, numbers thirsting after the living waters joined the persecuted people. Soon the room became too small to hold half the applicants for admission—no other room could be obtained—what could then be done? The first thing that was done was the adoption of the voluntary offering made by each, according to their means, nay, in some cases beyond their means, of money towards the building of a place of worship. One thousand francs (40*l.*) were raised amongst these earnest Christians towards the much-desired building. One poor cobbler told his pastor to put down his name for thirty francs. "Thirty francs, why how can you give such a sum?" "I can do so in a few weeks," was his answer; and in five weeks the poor man returned with his thirty francs donation, hardly earned by working over-hours, night and morning.

An appeal was then made to their Christian brethren in Italy and out of it, and the required sum was raised. Quattrini, the mason, the first convert, planned and superintended the building, and the people gave all their aid, and thanks chiefly to Quattrini's skill and care, and to the people's help, a neat church, capable of containing 250 people, was erected for the moderate sum of 340*l.*, the purchase of the land included. This little church was opened above a year ago. Many Christian friends, Rev. Dr. Stewart, Scotch minister at Leghorn; Dr. Revel, Vaudois Theological Professor at Florence; Rev. J. R. Macdougall, of Florence, and others, went to Elba to be present at the interesting event. All were greatly struck and affected by the serious yet joyous demeanour of the converts, and by the sweet voices of the school-children, raised in hymns of praise to their beloved Saviour—so lately made known to them. "I shall never forget," wrote an eye-witness, "the tears of joy shed by our good captain and mason when they heard 150 Evangelicals sing the praises of the Lord." The converts of each station manifest all men that he had already passed from death unto life, from darkness to light. To the last moment he implored his parents (Romanists) to seek Christ as their only Saviour; and when he could speak no more he alternately pointed to his Bible and to heaven, then meekly folding his arms across his breast, with a smile on his lips, he rejoicingly died—nay, rather let us say “he fell asleep in Jesus.” He was very poor, and during his two years’ illness the converts of the three stations spontaneously came forward with their contributions and supported him, and after death they paid his funeral expenses.

A cemetery at Rio Marina being much needed for the converts, they again came forward and paid for the ground and the walling it in.

A committee of women to look after the girls’ school has recently been formed; they meet also once a-month; and, poor themselves, they then sew and make garments for the children who are in still greater need.

The school-children, even, show a like self-denial and generosity. Last Christmas they went to their pastor with the sum of thirteen francs (about ten shillings), to which for a year they had, farthing by farthing, been contributing; they begged him to send half the amount to the publisher of a Sunday-school journal, and the remainder they wished to have sent to Dr. Revel, for the mission work in Italy! Thus, among the Elba converts, men, women, and

PROGRESS OF THE RELIGIOUS REVIVAL

The revival in Sweden progresses steadily. It began among the poor, the lowly, and among them it is spreading more and more; while at the same time it is fast gaining ground among those who are better off, and hold more prominent positions in society. Many of the latter, even persons of the highest rank, now openly profess their faith but the chapel doors had to be left open, and many of those who had not been able to get in stood outside, persevering in their efforts to catch the sound of the voices of those who prayed or addressed the assembly. Such was also the case at the June meetings, which, as well as those already mentioned, were held in Bethlehem Church, as the building is now called which formerly belonged to the Wesleyan body, and went by the name of the English Chapel. This, through the generosity and devotedness of the Wesleyans, instead of being sold to Government and applied to secular purposes, was, at considerable loss, disposed of to an association of Christian men, who since then have acted as trustees. It is the only place of worship in which any Christian man, clergyman or layman, may, independently of the Consistory of Stockholm, preach the Gospel, and the only place for meetings. But it is far too small for the proportions that such meetings have taken in Stockholm, and Mr. Beskow, a young and very popular clergyman, has conceived the idea, and already begun to put the plan into execution, of building a church, which shall be large enough to hold a much greater number of hearers than the existing churches do, which amounts to about 2,000. It will also be independent of the Consistory of Stockholm, though perfectly agreeing with it in doctrine. A small committee of Christian men will act as trustees, and in their hands would rest the appointment after the death or retirement of the first pastor. The population of Stockholm has much increased; and Government, seeing the want of another church, has acted judiciously and liberally in this matter, taking the subject into due consideration, and then giving Mr. Beskow full permission to build such a place of worship as he intends, and guaranteeing to him the non-interference of the clerical authorities. It is therefore to be hoped that on the very appropriate ground chosen a place of worship will be erected, where it will be possible, without risking health and comfort, to hear such preachers as not only Mr. Beskow himself, but Mr. Wadstrom, Mr. Bring, and others, who also draw very crowded audiences, and where prayer-meetings, and others of the same kind, may be held. Mr. Beskow, trusting the Lord, and believing His promises, has himself advanced the money for the ground; and hopes to find, as he goes on, that others come forward to help him. None but those who know Sweden well are able to form an estimate of the importance of this movement.

The revival has been fruitful in works of mercy; all flourishing, but none so much as the Deaconesses' Institution, which has grown to a size and importance certainly not anticipated by the founders, who in 1849 laid the first humble foundation of this interesting work. Nearly a hundred deaconesses are now at work in different fields of labour, schools, orphan-houses, hospitals, or in the Institution itself, which includes many different departments of usefulness in the training of the young women for the different spheres in which they are destined to act; the schools, which are numerous; the home for orphan girls, 22 in number; the school of discipline; the refuge for fallen women; the hospital for incurables; and lastly, the hospital for the sick that are daily brought in;—all these different agencies are at work, principally within the walls of the two spacious and comfortable houses that have of late been constructed not far from the Church of St. Catherine, commanding a beautiful view of the Baltic, but also in some smaller adjacent buildings. The deaconesses have in almost every instance enjoyed the best character for usefulness and Christian conduct. Some went to Denmark during the late war, and directed the hospitals for the wounded soldiers. They were much prized by the Danish authorities, and one of them was called upon to superintend the establishment of a similar institution in Copenhagen. It has pleased God hitherto to preserve this work in Stockholm from all taint of Tractarianism or monastic views. It was first during many years under the care of an excellent and highly-gifted lady, but her health broke down, and a young clergyman, Mr. John Bring, is now at the head of this establishment.

A Missionary Seminary has also been opened during the course of these last years, and is doing well. The first missionaries are to be sent out this year. Sunday-schools increase in numbers, and so do day-schools and working meetings, and many other signs of a growing interest in religion; but while with much gratitude we review these remarkable changes, and hope good things from the Lord as regards the future, it would not be right to present too sunny a picture of the state of things in Sweden. There is no doubt that in some circles infidelity is in a very serious manner gaining ground, and that in others Swedenborgianism is making its way, and subverting the pure religion of Christ. It therefore behoves all Swedes who feel an interest in the

They have driven their neighbours to at the first suspicion of sickness. I know a place, where an old woman, who never the cholera at all, was sent by her own Aren, who did nothing more for her comfort there than to dig a grave for her, and then her to starve, from which fate she was rescued by some foreigners, who found by chance.

An English engineer was taken sick on his steamer, and the Greeks on board expelled the captain to put him ashore to

They would not even allow him to tow poor man in a boat ten miles to his home, he was put ashore, and carried a mile or in the hot sun to this same hospital where old woman was sent to starve. He died re, of course, in a few hours, and then relief was demanded from his family for rying him to the hospital and attending there. I might multiply such examples most indefinitely, but enough has been said to show the general spirit of the Greeks, which has elevated the single idea of individual self-preservation above every other duty and instinct. Even the Jews have shown a better spirit than the Greeks.

The religious ideas of the various sects, of course, prompted them to adopt various plans to stay the progress of the epidemic. The Turks, believing that the seeds of the cholera are sown by night by jinn, for several weeks paraded the streets every night, repeating charms and portions of the Koran, to drive away the unfriendly spirits. I understand that these processions were finally prohibited by the Government. The Greeks made up for their want of manliness and courage by an excess of religious devotion. They paraded the streets, night and day, with sacred pictures, candles, and prayers to the Virgin. The churches, to which the most famous of these pictures belonged, received large sums for the privilege of carrying them about the streets. By request of the Grand Vizier, the Greek Patriarch issued a special order, releasing all Greeks from keeping the strict fast of fifteen days which usually precedes the feast of the Virgin. The promulgation of this order in the churches caused great commotion. More than one bishop was driven from his church on attempting to read it. It was in vain that they were told to keep thirty days' fast after the epidemic was over. They accused their bishops of making Protestants of them, and insisted on fasting with more severity than usual, to propitiate the Virgin.

The Jews have suffered more than any other of the native communities, and they are alleged to have offered blood sacrifices to propitiate God. They were also ordered to confess their sins to their priests. Thousands did so, expecting absolution after the fashion of the Catholic confessional, but the Grand Rabbi had no such idea in mind, and immediately commenced punishing the people for the sins which they had confessed. The confusion which followed can be better imagined than described, when it is remembered that dishonesty and immorality are the chief characteristics of the Jews resident here.

The foreign population, as a whole, has displayed much courage and good feeling. I cannot forbear mentioning the fact that Rev. Mr. Gribble, Chaplain of the British Embassy, hastened back from Germany in the midst of the epidemic to minister to his people. He has been most efficiently aided in this work by Rev. Mr. Knapp, who occupied the chaplaincy during his absence.

The American missionaries have laboured unceasingly among the poorer classes, and have attended personally between four and five hundred cases of cholera and cholerae, besides administering medicine to many lighter cases. They have published a statement of their method of treatment, which is too long to be reproduced here; but it appears that the mortality among those whom they have attended has not exceeded five per cent., although many of the cases have been in the worst and most filthy rooms of the khans.

I might name many others who have shown great devotion in labouring for the sick. The physicians, as a general rule, have displayed more than usual courage, although it must be added that the fees demanded by many of them have been enormous.

TERRIBLE FIRE IN STAMBOUL.

Pestilence and fire seem to be in some way mysteriously connected. We had scarcely begun to recover from the most terrible scourge which has ever visited the city, when, as in London after the plague, there came the most extensive conflagration ever known in Stamboul. A week ago 400 houses were burned in the Jewish quarter. Almost every day since there have been smaller fires in different parts of the city. On Tuesday evening, September 5, a fire broke out not far from the Custom-house, on the Stamboul side of the Golden Horn, which burned for twenty-four hours, and will long be remembered as "the great fire of Constantinople." It was driven on by a very high north wind, and only stopped when, at various points, it

PORT OF THE MEDICAL COMMISSION.

The following extract from the report of the Medical Commission to the Grand Duke will illustrate better than I can the manner in which Christian employés of the Government are expected to treat their superiors. The report contains no statistics, and is made up wholly of statements like the following. Keep in mind the fact that at least 100 persons have died within two months of cholera in the city, the value of the services rendered can be very easily estimated:—

On the 16th of last July, your Highness, the Grand Duke, interpreter of the noble intentions of your august Sovereign, appointed the Extraordinary Commission of Public Health, and assigned the duty of combating by all possible means the cholera which had invaded the capital. Your Commission, during the six weeks just past, has occupied itself in conquering the epidemic by measures for the public health, undertaken on a large scale; by the most advisable preventive measures; by the establishment of houses of refuge, ambulances, hospitals, &c.; by the organization of a service of domiciliary assistance in short, by all the means of which the epidemic, under such circumstances, is undoubtedly prevented. These measures preserved the healthy, relieved the suffering, saved many from being victims, and re-established the courage of the population by their results.

All the measures taken by your Commission during the first period of its action have received the high approval of your Highness. They will be forthwith brought to the notice of Europe and of the scientific world, as well as the results obtained, to the glory of our august Sovereign and of his enlightened Government. Meanwhile, your Commission considers itself happy to be able at present to inform your Highness that the epidemic, combated in spite of its extreme virulence, driven back step by step, is in full retreat from all its positions. In a short time the last trace of its odious presence will have disappeared from our beautiful capital. The relieved people will bless the inexhaustible benevolence of its powerful monarch. Your Commission finds itself on the point of entering on a new period of its existence, much more important than the former, and much more difficult to bring to a successful issue.

Before entering upon it, all the members of the Commission feel the necessity of informing your Highness that, up to the present time simple instruments of the will of your Highness, they have throughout endeavoured to become imbued with your unconquerable energy. Your high intelligence and your sure penetration have been their guides in this painful struggle. We attribute the success of the measures of the Commission solely to your Highness.

INDIA.

HINDOO IMMORALITY AND MISSIONARY EFFORT.

The following sketch, which presents some of the principal features, is from a missionary of the Baptist Society:—

Cutwa, near Burdwan, Bengal,
July 15, 1865.

Cutwa is, as you are most likely aware, an important station of the Baptist Missionary Society, judging from the early records of the Society, there must have been formerly a serious cause here. The first members of the Church have long since entered their rest; and have gone to other mission stations, only a few families now remain. Cutwa is an important, and at the same time a fertile field for missionary labour. At certain seasons of the year thousands upon thousands of Hindoos come from far off places to bathe in the Gagarathi River—the Gunga of Hindooism.

In Cutwa itself and the surrounding country the Gospel is very favourably received; people listen attentively, and urge us to preach as often as possible. The better educated people admit that Christianity is a true religion: they would not be unwilling to find a saviour for Christ in their Pantheon; and their faith is only aroused when we insist on it there is but "one name given under heaven by which men may be saved." Frequently the remark is made, "Jesus Christ was certainly holy, but it is quite right for Christians to worship him; but as we also worship God, though in another way, it is not necessary for us to change religion and become outcasts." Very many think it beneath them to stand in the bazaar side by side with the common people and hear the Gospel preached, and so several have, of their own accord, requested me to meet them once a-week, after dark, at the house of one of their number. The last time they met there were perhaps twenty-five present, and the interest they manifested was very encouraging. This movement is headed by a respectable Hindoo who is in heart a Christian, and hopes ere long to be enabled to publicly avow the faith he cherishes. The poorer classes generally hear the Gospel with pleasure; but still the majority of them are influenced by a phase of Hindooism prevalent here that is most detrimental to our work. I refer to the worship of Chaitanya, the last Hindoo reformer of any note. As this prevails very much here, perhaps no apology will be necessary for saying a little about it. Respecting the doctrines peculiar to this sect the people trouble themselves but very little; enough for them that Chaitanya popularised the loves of Krishna and Radhika, his favourite mistress. With a few pet phrases on their lips as the shibboleth of their creed, they too frequently make the worship of Chaitanya a cloak for immoralities that are beyond all description. About here very many of the Bosh-toms, as they are called, have taken to the profession of begging, as the most respectable and religious way of passing their time. As this excrescence of Hindooism fosters immorality, it is very popular, especially with the ignorant and unthinking. A short time ago, at the Agra Dwip mela, there were perhaps 15,000 persons present, nearly all Bosh-toms, and more women than men. Most of mela are performed what are called—to use as mild a term as possible—left-hand marriages. All that is required is the payment to the guru (teacher) of the usual fee—namely, one rupee, four annas—equal to about two shillings and sixpence. It can be dissolved at the pleasure of either party, on the payment of the same sum to the guru. The spiritual guides of these Boshtoms are the Babajis, of whom it may be sufficient to say that they are equally destitute of clothing and modesty: a detailed account of their practices would be scarcely possible in English. Young women and girls are decoyed by them in great numbers to be initiated into the mysteries of Vaishnavism. One lesson they are taught is, that the entire surrender of the body to the Babaji is at once the means of salvation, and the highest act of religious worship one can perform, seeing that he is the living representative of Krishna. Now, in a district where there prevails such a system of gross immorality assuming a religious garb, it is scarcely a matter for surprise that the people are slow to embrace the pure Gospel of Christ. The want of a moral sense in these people is perhaps the greatest trial a missionary labouring amongst them can experience, and it gives increased intensity to the apostolic request, “Brethren, pray for us.”

For some time past we have had an intelligent convert employed as itinerant preacher and colporteur. He stays away, on an average, a month at a time, and visits two or three villages a-day. In this way villages that had been overlooked, or were perhaps inaccessible from the want of roads, have been visited by the preacher of the Gospel, consequence of this paucity of friends to help their education; to N Calcutta; while the poor their homes must grow lie open to all the influence. I have tried for a mission school, cit one of the villages; but plications, have hitherto much as one pice for the Christian friends in ignorance makes the every guru and Babaji upon his credulity, and they would then be far the matter of Christian are now asking for miss help to defray the ex urgent intreaties I can help you at all in the say, however, that reced has generously expenses of two mission but what are they among this subject I feel tempted to the colporteur's journey after talking to the go with him, I perceived acquainted with Christian reason, the gomaster re here go to Dr. Duff's school they come home for the all they have heard about tianity.”

EAST AFRICA.

BISHOP TOZER AT ZANZIBAR.

News has been received of the safe arrival of Miss Tozer at Zanzibar. It is stated that the progress of the native children, both boys and girls, has been very satisfactory.

lesson in chapel; they two hymns in English conduct is beyond all sums in addition and many long rows of figures the town to see the Malagasy quarter, and an old grandmother of our little Mankono. We started in procession—first the nine boys, two and two, M'Bili na M'Bili, in red fez caps and long white Arab garments, their best, looking so clean and pretty; then the bishop and I, followed by six of the girls in pink frocks and white handkerchiefs; the rear brought up by Dr. Steere and Miss Jones. It was like a walk, or a dream of a walk, in the "Arabian Nights," nothing so marvellous and dreamy I never saw!—pictures presenting themselves at every turn—each form and face a study. Through the English quarter, where Colonel Playfair is supreme, the narrow streets are paved with a sort of cement; but when we left this quarter it was dust and dirt, very narrow and tortuous, very anxious. Crowds of dark and dusky faces and costumes totally indescribable—ornaments, armbands, ear and nose jewels, turbans, caftans, and every few steps a rise, a covering of the face, and "Salaam," from one another. The bishop is evidently considered a great person, "the head of all religion," as the Sultan calls him—"the pious, the exalted, the illustrious, the distinguished, the most beloved, our brother and friend, the bishop." "I have naturally come to lay my open hand over my face, and to my 'Salaam,' quite as if I had been accustomed to do it all my life." The sight of two new faces, and ladies walking in the day, was enough to excuse any amount of staring and remark; but though all eyes were turned to us, I saw no smile, and heard no remark beyond "Salaam" as we went on. When we got to the Malagasy quarter, things altered; dusky faces looked out, and "Jamba, jamba, sana, sana" were repeated, and called after us incessantly—"Welcome, very welcome." "Good morning, very very much," it means, and of course we responded; but when we came to the cluster of huts where we intended visiting the grandmother, how shall we describe the scene? We were surrounded instantly by, I think, a hundred people. I was seized and dragged into a hut, and seated forcibly and hospitably on a mat, while women crowded round me, touching me gently, and speaking welcome words. I escaped to the outer air as soon as I could, where the crowd was increased, Mankono being loudly welcomed by his relatives, and the bishop and Dr. Steere made to sit on a kind of throne formed of mats; a chair was also produced from some corner, and we were the centre of a dense admiring assemblage.

The visit lasted about twenty minutes, I think; then we took our leave, and, accompanied by some fifty black forms, we departed, the grandmother coming with us some distance, as is the custom here, and then with "Salaams" departing. One man came the whole way, more than a mile, but the greater part gradually dropped off sooner or later. Coming back in the dusk, we had wonderful glimpses into most picturesque interiors, where lamps stood lighted on the floor, and pillows round, for the evening chat. Dear little fair Arab bairns, with glittering black eyes, covered their faces with tiny hands, and said, "Bon jour," and "Salaam;" handsome grave Arabs, in beautiful garments, rose slowly from the door-steps with the same. All at once, in the middle of the narrow Oriental way (I cannot call it street), we came on two persons, who lifted their caps and stood to look at us. They were Americans arrived on Sunday in a large Boston merchant ship. But can't you fancy how an English face or costume would, suddenly coming on you, awake you, as it were, out of a dream?

I like the life, so far, extremely. There is work enough for ten women instead of three. I am learning and repeating Swahili from morning till night. Dr. Steere has made me a short grammar, and gives me fresh papers as fast as I learn the old ones. Salim, our head Arab from the Consulate, sits at my feet hearing me repeat, with infinite patience, the numbers, which I can now count up to a thousand; the Arabic and Swahili are curiously mixed, the units being in Swahili, the tens in Arabic. He can't speak much English, but encourages me by saying "By-and-bye you speaky Zanzibar—to-morrow—next day—Sunday."

I do not know where to begin to tell you anything, it is all so strange and new. The heat is beyond what you ever feel in England, and the mosquitoes are very troublesome. Good bye.—Ever most affectionately yours,

HELEN R. TOZER.

THE BISHOPS AND THE RITUALISTS.

We are glad to find that several of the bishops are setting themselves to stem the current of ritualism which has set in with much force in certain quarters. Among these, the new Bishop of Ely, Dr. Harold Browne, has honourably distinguished himself. A correspondence between his lordship and the Rev. Mr. Molyneux, of St. Peter's, Sudbury, has brought into clearer light than we have elsewhere seen the views of objects of the ritualists. Often as we have heard of lights on the altar, their use, or the doctrines they were meant to symbolise, were not avowed, till Mr. Molyneux condescended to inform us. The reverend gentleman explains that they are a symbol or declaration that the body and blood of Christ, from which His humanity and divinity are never separate, are really and essentially present—as truly so as they were on Calvary. What this Popish doctrine has to do with the Church of England, or how lighted candles symbolise it, Mr. Molyneux does not explain.

The controversy arose out of certain circumstances that took place at a consecration at Sudbury. Mr. Molyneux urged the bishop which authorises the use of such ornaments as were in use in the second year of Edward VI. He says there were lights on the altar then, and therefore there ought to be lights on the altar now. To all this the bishop coolly replies in effect: Granting that altars were then in use, yet as the Privy Council decided in the Round Church case that we have at the present time only communion tables, and not altars, the injunction of King Edward that there should be "two lights upon the high altar" does not now apply. The rejoinder of Mr. Molyneux to this clenching argument is a fine burst of Tractarian feeling: "If the statement means that there is an essential difference between an altar and a communion table, and that the Lord's table in our churches is not truly and essentially an altar, then I unhesitatingly and fearlessly say, that as truly as the Church of England is catholic this statement is false. No altar in Anglican Churches! Of course, then, no sacrifice, no priesthood, no church! What a triumph for the Roman Catholics." The reverend gentleman, in the excitement of his feelings, appears to have forgotten the one great High Priest, and His offering made once for all. In a correspondence in another quarter the bishop strongly condemns the practice of compulsory confession.

But the wrath of the Tractarians descends most heavily upon the Bishop of London, who has apparently made up his mind at last to put a stop, as far as his power extends, to the progress of ritualism in his diocese. His manly and decided conduct at the consecration of a church at Shoreditch was the first intimation of his intention, and they must be removed.

The Rev. C. Lyford, tho that the flowers should be the churchwarden to see if nosegays were removed from the communion table and vestry.

The bishop then surveyed, most of whom were with richly-embroidered "High Church" insignia said, quietly but sternly my diocese must appear to-day in the simple dress of the Church of England!" They bowed, and at once removed silk one, with rich embroidery), and his example other clergymen present noticed a small cross in pocket high, decorated with flowers, which had been the wardrobe. He asked being answered "nothing taken down and put in serving that it was a garments were not complete inspection, so that the been raised, and all unple consecration avoided. In a procession, and process of the church, where the choirs chanting; the disallowed by the bishop, was aisle, and passed to the far the large congregation near 1,000 persons, were any hitch having occurred detailed having taken place

Length his lordship said, "If you will give undertaking to efface that cartoon I will proceed." Assent being given, the bishop instructed Dr. T. Twiss to draw up an undertaking to that effect, saying that the registrar would read the petition whilst it was being done. Dr. T. Twiss then went into the vestry and drew up the following memorandum:—

"We hereby undertake to remove to-morrow the unfinished cartoon on the east end of the chancel wall of the church of St. Michael and All Angels.—August 24, 1865."

Dr. Twiss then returned to the chancel, and the document was signed in presence of the congregation by the Rev. Charles Lyford, incumbent; Mr. James Tranter, churchwarden; and Mr. James Brooks, architect.

The bishop then said: "I have no objection to consecrate this church in accordance with the prayer of that petition."

The consecration was then proceeded with in the usual manner.

From that day to the present the bishop has not ceased to be the object of abuse and detraction by the ultra High Church organs. So indiscriminate are they in the missiles they hurl at him, that they publish with greatunction a letter from an ex-Dissenting minister named Crampton, who states that he had intended to seek ordination in the Church, but, after seeing the extraordinary conduct of the bishop, he cannot do so. Other correspondents are still more virulent. The Churchman publishes a long letter from a correspondent, who charges the bishop with being in league with the Rationalists, with owing his advancement to the bench to Prince Albert, who, it is politely hinted, was the great patron of scepticism and semi-fidelity, and with acting in concert with Dean Stanley and others to give infidelity the same status with Christianity. He is warned, however, that he is pursuing a perilous course, and that, though he may not be within the reach of the temporal laws or the ordinary courts, yet he has rendered himself liable to be cited before Convocation, to render an account of his questionable conduct, and compelled, under penalty of suspension or deposition, to make such declarations or engagements, and to do such acts, as the Convocation shall deem requisite for the security of the faith and the due discharge of his episcopal duties. We have no wish to defend the bishop's intimacy with the leading Rationalists; we deplore his readiness on all occasions to apologise for them; but assuredly the threat of being visited with the censures of Convocation is more likely to move, in his mind, scorn than repentance.

PROPOSED UNION OF THE GREEK, ROMAN, AND ANGLICAN CHURCHES.

Our readers are aware that a secret society has existed for some time in the Church of England, the object of which is to bring about a union of the Greek, Roman, and Anglican Churches. The bond of the association is the agreeing to recite, at stated times, a short intercessory prayer for the union of the three churches, to which is added, in the case of priests, "the offering, at least once in three months, of the Holy Sacrifice with the same intention." Laymen, however, are prominent members of the association; and it may be added, that the Hon. Mr. Boyle, brother to the Earl of Glasgow, lost his seat for Buteshire at the last general election mainly because it was known that he was the honorary secretary of one of its branches. A great many services were held in connexion with this association during the past month, and it is said that on one Sunday lately there was the celebration of the sacrament in connexion with the subject in no fewer than 300 churches in England. The character of these services may be illustrated by what took place at one of them:—

The Rev. George Nugee, of Wymering, near Portsmouth, on Sunday week, caused a solemn Te Deum to be sung in the church of Wymering, "for the peace of the nations and the reunion of the churches of Christendom." The Te Deum having been sung, Mr. Nugee divested himself of his surplice; put on a white silk cope embroidered with gold, and took his stand with two assistants before the altar. The preacher spoke of the grand spectacle which they had witnessed at Portsmouth. It was a glad thing, he said, to see nation side by side with nation, once more interchanging friendly salutes and forgetting past animosities. But what we all yearned to see was the churches of Christendom moored side by side. There were three great divisions of the Catholic Church—the Latin, Greek, and Anglican. Was not the time fast coming when they too should forget their differences and be reunited in the one faith? He alluded to the first step towards such a reunion in the intercommunion recently established between the Servian and English Churches. This offer on the part of the Bishop of Servia, sealed as it had been by their admission of a priest of the English Church (the Rev. W. Denton, of St. Bartholomew's, Moorfields) to holy communion, was a fact which called for the greatest exultation.

With reference to this communion between the Servian Church and the Rev. Mr. Denton, which has been much trumpeted about in other places than Portsmouth, the Levant Herald tells the following curious tale:—

union with the Greek Church he was determined to have. And therefore he went travelling into the interior of Servia in quest of some Greek priest who would do the needful. His voyage of discovery was far more successful than he anticipated, for on arriving at some out-of-the-way monastery, the abbot of it offered to administer the sacrament to him; at least, so Mr. — declares, while the abbot gives a different version of this preliminary transaction. Whether this offer was made proprio motu or not, I am not prepared to say. Be this as it may, the vicar, of course, was agreeably surprised, and very naturally, too, at being made the object of it. He there and then attended the monastic service, and publicly received from the hands of the abbot the holy sacrament according to the laws and practice of the Orthodox Church. Shortly after this Mr. — left Servia, carrying with him a very flattering impression of the liberality of the Servian clergy, and the strong conviction that he had succeeded in accomplishing intercommunication between the Orthodox and Anglican Churches. The poor abbot came to Belgrade, gave his chief, the metropolitan, an account of his and the vicar's doings, and was suspended and ultimately degraded for having made an "improper use of his sacred office." Risum teneatis, amici. In the meantime the news of the vicar's success flew to England, and was paraded in the Churchman and other English papers as a convincing proof of an approaching union between the Churches Anglican and Orthodox.

THE NEW REGIUS PROFESSOR AT OXFORD.

Dr. Jacobson's successor as Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford is the Rev. Robert Payne Smith, M.A., sub-librarian of the Bodleian Library. The reverend gentleman is one of the most eminent Hebrew and Syrian scholars in Europe, has given proof of his ability as an author, and is known as a man of piety. The Times says:—

UNITARIANISM I

We do not look muc of spiritual life among We are accustomed to the depository of every s theory; and though we c bers with originating as the day, we never dou arose would find its wa the Unitarians. But i ministers among them w rapid progress and the ouched in somewhat ambiguous language, as meant, and was universally understood to mean, that the Unitarians maintained the doctrine of the special and immediate divine origin of Christianity. His resolution was rejected by a majority of the meeting, several members voting against him who avowed that they agreed with him in holding the doctrines he maintained, but that they protested against the imposition of a test, in any form, upon Unitarian sciences. This appeared to us, at the time, to be so much a matter of course, coming from the well-known views and opinions of leading men in the Unitarian body, that we did not think the matter worth notice. It has, however, attracted our attention than we imagined it would, and has since become a matter of comment and controversy, not only in the organs of the orthodox denominations, but among the members of the Unitarian body themselves. We do not expect that the denomination will retrace its steps; the members are too much under the control of such men as Sir John Bowring—who deliberately vows, as his last and carefully-matured opinion, that he has heard more of the spirit of Christ from the lips of enlightened Buddhist teachers than from benighted orthodox Christians—to lead us to expect that they will ever consent to bind themselves by creed or declaration to any doctrine in favour of revealed truth. But it may be that the restless spirit of Rationalism may lead the more thoughtful of the body to review opinions which are capable of producing such fruits as these, and gradually bring them back to the only safe standing-ground of believing in Jesus not only as a divine teacher, but as being himself truly and essentially divine.

THE NATIONAL SUNDAY LEAGUE.

The council of this society, which our readers must understand is one for Sunday recreation, not Sunday observance, have announced their intention to organise a series of open-air demonstrations in favour of opening the British Museum, National Gallery, and other institutions, on Sundays, during the coming winter. The resolution was come to at a meeting of the League, and the plan of operations was sketched by Mr. Baxter Langley with amusing frankness. It ought to be explained that the directors of the Crystal Palace have encouraged several Sunday demonstrations within their grounds during the last month; and on one occasion Mr. Langley explained the purpose of the League in the following terms. He said:—

It was utterly useless to rely in the least upon petitions, for by means of thousands of signatures, which he asserted to be forgeries, and worse than forgeries (whatever that may mean), the Sabbatarian party could always beat them hollow in getting up petitions. The Ministry would not interfere unless the people expressed their desire unmistakably, and therefore they "must have a sensation." Their object must be attained by getting up demonstrations. These must not be absolutely illegal, but they must be as near the law as possible. Now the law, he believed, forbade any popular gathering out of doors within a mile of the Houses of Parliament; why not therefore assemble some Sunday a hundred thousand determined men, women, and children, form them into a line, say four deep, at Charing-cross, and keep moving round and round the fountains, in front of the National Gallery, continually crying out, "Open the National Gallery on Sundays." And then march on from there to the British Museum, and leave their cards (!!) with the sentinels there, unanimously demanding to have the British Museum opened on Sundays; and then the following Sunday assemble in the Kensington Gardens, march about there, and then proceed to the South Kensington Museum, with a similar demand upon their lips. This, he said, was what the League proposed to do this winter, and it would probably make an impression which nothing else would.

Of course this rant must be taken for what it is worth. Whether the people of London will march about the streets at Mr. Langley's bidding remains to be seen; but if a mob of roughs and idle boys can be assembled, we have no doubt the police will be able to give a good account of them. As for the eagerness of the population to have museums, &c., opened on Sundays, we may form an opinion from one fact. At one of these Sunday demonstrations at the Crystal Palace, Dr. Perfitt undertook to give a lecture on Assyrian and Babylonian antiquities. There were 6,000 persons present on that day, and out of the number, when Dr. Perfitt took up his stand in the Assyrian Court, he was favoured with a select audience of just thirty persons, the remainder being scattered about the grounds, and devoting themselves to the creature comforts provided at the refreshment stalls.

THE LATE REV. C. E. OAKLEY.

The metropolis has lost one of its most efficient spiritual labourers, and religious society one of its brightest ornaments, by the decease of the Rev. C. E. Oakley, Rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden. Mr. Oakley died at Rhyll, on the 15th ult., of typhoid fever, caught while engaged in visiting the houses of his poor parishioners. He was only thirty-six years of age, but he had out-station there were "characteristics of a genuine religious awakening." The missionary's five days' stay there, on a recent visit, was almost "one continuous preaching service." At another place, he says, "night after night, the brethren almost robbed me of sleep, by their eager discussions and questions;" from one distant town a deputation had been sent to Broosa to plead that a native preacher might be furnished them, and from another "a similar application" had been received. "Never were there so many encouraging prospects" in that vicinity.

PERSIA.

Letters from the Nestorian mission received by the American Board speak of great injustice inflicted by powerful Mohammedans upon the poor Nestorians; of temptations to worldliness set before helpers in the missionary work, to which there, as everywhere, weak human nature is too ready to yield; of the usefulness of Bible-reading women; and of much to encourage in the general aspect of the field. Cheering facts are mentioned by the missionaries as to the progress they have been permitted to witness. Thus, the Rev. Mr. Cochran quotes the testimony of an aged priest, that robbery, burglary, and other crimes had lessened more than one-half in the districts occupied by the missionaries since their labours commenced; and leading Mussulmans, it is said, are now bearing testimony to the good results of the Gospel. The general statistics of the Nestorian mission are as follows:—

Our tabular view gives seventy-four preachers (some of whom also teach), who regularly break the bread of life in at least as many different villages, besides seventeen teachers who conduct religious services, more or less. I have not been able to procure the precise number in our congregations. It is probable, however, that the aggregate is considerably above two thousand. The whole number of communicants received is six hundred and thirty-three, of whom about twenty-five have been excommunicated. The accessions for the last year were seventy-two, and judging from the number of candidates, we may look for more than a hundred during the current year.

The most valuable results have followed the training given in the seminaries:—

Our male seminary has graduated ninety-nine pupils, of whom ninety-two have been received to our communion. The female seminary has graduated fifty-five, of whom forty-eight are communicants. Of those who have been connected with the male seminary a year or more, one hundred and forty-three are communicants, while of those similarly connected with the female seminary, eighty are communicants; yet probably not half a dozen of these were converted previous to entering these institutions. The total of these is two hundred and twenty-three communicants, out of six hundred and thirty-three, our whole number, or more than one-third of the whole; thus giving, as you will observe, no small importance to the seminaries as direct converting agencies, not to speak of their essential importance in supplying helpers, and carrying forward the work generally.

We regret to learn that the missionaries are opposed by the Persian Government:—

Meerza Nejif Ali, agent for the Christians, while he has not, as yet, annoyed any considerable number of the Evangelical Nestorians, still seems to be constantly aiming, in a most covert and intriguing way, to undermine the Evangelical work. His opposition to the French Lazarists is even more open and positive. His errand seems to be a crusade against all foreign agencies and influence. . . . The avowals and efforts of the agent are insignificant, as revealing a new policy on the part of the Government. The Evangelicals are now for the first time recognised as a sect, are placed on a footing with the other sects, and are not to be destroyed, but starved out by intolerant restrictions. We feel assured that this hostility will all be overruled for the furtherance of the Gospel, and if persisted in, we shall be greatly disappointed if it does not result in the speedy opening of the Gospel door to Mussulmans.

INDIA.

The senior missionary of the Church of England Society in Tinnevely, the Rev. J. Thomas, who has laboured for thirty years in that province, and has been of late in charge of congregations numbering 12,000 converts, has proposed to the committee the immediate appointment of a native bishop, not having authority over Europeans, but over the native church only, to whom should be transferred the self-supporting congregations and spiritual agents.

I should be prepared [writes Mr. Thomas] to hand over to him at once fifteen or twenty of my best congregations, and make the utmost endeavour every year to increase the number as contributions increased. Other districts might be willing and able to double this number, and there would be at once, not a mere nucleus of a native church, but a goodly number of congregations to be superintended, which would form by no means an insignificant episcopate. . . . While the native bishop would be entirely independent of the European clergy, they would be able to assist him, and strengthen his hands in a variety of ways, until the time arrived to withdraw altogether. The native church would by this means be materially strengthened, and experience would be gained by the bishop, native clergy, and catechists, in self-government and management of their own affairs. A great increase would, I am persuaded, soon appear in the number of ordained what proud of the appearance of the place; and the conclusion that was arrived at was, that afore the most effectual, and at the same time most appropriate way of annoying me was that burning down the village. Another thing which inclined them to adopt this course in particular that a few months before all the school-rooms in Suviseshapuram, a Church missionary on only five miles off, had been burnt down, as was supposed, by a dismissed schoolmaster, had managed to elude conviction and to escape with impunity. Accordingly, on the 5th ember, at midnight, an incendiary fire was raised in the village of Edeyengoody, and six of best houses in the village, forming one side of the best street, were burnt down, including the e of Mr. Samuel, the native minister, against whom the conspirators seem to have had a al ill-will. On this occasion the supposed incendiary, Pakyanathen's younger brother, was , but not laid hold of, so as to set the question of identity at rest to the satisfaction of the t; and as all the people in the village connected with the mission, including Mr. Samuel elf, were impressed from the outset with the belief that it would be impossible for them to edress, the case was not so vigorously followed up as it might have been, and the accused n escaped conviction. I returned home at the same time as the released prisoner and his ds, and was sorry to see the village so much disfigured by the fire, but still more sorry to iver the impression that had been produced amongst the people generally by this second re of justice in the same neighbourhood. The good were everywhere discouraged, the inally-disposed classes emboldened. I felt persuaded, for my own part, that "the triumphing e wicked would be but for a moment," and that the result would be for the best in the end, gh in what manner it would turn out to be for the best I could not then foresee; but natives easily terrified, and soon give up all for lost, and many even of the better sort required to have : faith in God's government of the world strengthened. Again and again I read to them the 37th m, many portions of which seemed to them particularly reassuring—"Rest in the Lord and wait ntly for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man bringeth wicked devices to pass. For evil doers shall be cut off, but those that wait upon Lord, they shall inherit the earth."

After a second fire in the same village, the incendiaries were detected, and four of them—yanathen, the ex-school inspector, being of the number—were sentenced, after conviction, ight years' imprisonment, with hard labour. Quietness and confidence were then restored.

CHINA.

The hospital in connexion with the London Mission at Peking continues a useful adjunct irect spiritual work. Among those who have applied for relief from suffering, not a ave found their way to the knowledge of Christianity; and now a respectable church ts, consisting of upwards of forty baptized persons, a large number of inquirers and icants for baptism, with two flourishing boys' schools. A new dispensary has been opened he west, and another is about to be established in the east of the city. "The most hopeful of any station," says Dr. Dudgeon, "whether medical or otherwise, in China, is the large adance of women. When we get the women, we necessarily have the children, and the soon follow—prejudice, pride, and exclusiveness soon disappear." Recently a country-came in from a town 150 miles distant, and reported that there were more than 100 ons residing in his neighbourhood desirous of receiving Christian instruction. On er inquiry, eight respectable persons were discovered who might be relied on as sincerely ing to be taught, and one of them has since proceeded to the capital, to obtain the tual help thus asked. The call has, doubtless, ere this been answered.

We regret to record the death of Miss Baxter, who has been cut off in the midst of a r of no ordinary usefulness. She had only attained the age of thirty-six. Her father Robert Baxter, the well-known solicitor and family had been urging her to return home, ly to recruit her strength for labour in a climate too depressing to Europeans to render fe to remain under its influence for more than five years. But she could not bring her- to leave her scene of labour. Bishop Smith thus writes respecting the deceased lady e Record:—

More than five years ago, Miss Harriet Sophia Baxter dedicated her life and talents to the k of Christian education among Chinese females; and went to Hong Kong unsupported by any gionary society, and dependent for the pecuniary means of working out her beneficent schemes issionary usefulness on her own private resources and those of her family, with the assistance he Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, and other friends on the spot. In multitude and variety of her zealous and energetic labours she prematurely wore out her ngth, and has entered early into her rest. How great has been the loss sustained by the mis- ary cause in the removal of this devoted and efficient labourer is proved by the sorrow pre- nt among Europeans and Chinese at Hong Kong, where she has secured a permanent place he affectionate memory and respect of the native race, for whose benefit she cheerfully sacri- d the endearments of her native land and home.

MADAGASCAR.

A story of further disquietude and disturbances in Madagascar has recently appeared in

At a missionary conference, held just before the ordination, by the Bishop of Grahamstown, of two clergymen who had arrived in South Africa from England, it was resolved that these gentlemen, who represented the Propagation Society, should be sent to Independent Caffraria, to look out for the most suitable place in which to begin a new mission there. They were accompanied on their journey by another clergyman, and by two Kaffirs as guides and interpreters. It was decided that they would apply first to a chief named Umditshwa, or leave to begin a mission in his country : he is at the head of a part of the Amampondonisi, and bears the best character of any chief with all the English, who know him, for all the heathen virtues. He is about the only chief who has no missionary in his country, and at the same time he has often begged for one from the Wesleyans, who are not in a position to send him one.

Speaking of the antecedents of this chief, the missionaries say :—

He has been driven out of his land by his enemies, of whom the chief are the Tambookies, Qeya's people, of whom (Qeya, I mean) you may have heard as being half Christianised ; this is the largest of the Kaffir tribes, at least on this side of Natal, and amongst a section of them we are now living. Umditshwa has thus been driven into a corner of his land ; his people formerly extended from the Umtata river as far as the Tsitsa or the Tina ; now they have been forced to leave the Umtata, and occupy a mountainous district on the banks of the Tsitsa, some fifty or sixty miles above its junction with the St. John's River or Umzimvubu.

On their arrival at their destination, the missionary party found that the chief was absent. They were welcomed, however, by his friends, who showed great attention, almost reverence, as the missionaries sought to convey to them some of the leading points of the Gospel. The chief having returned—

The question of the acceptance of our offer did not take long to settle : there was a council about fifty men by the cattle enclosure, or kraal, which was soon transferred to the front of our tent, where we were seated watching the proceedings. We were all struck with the candour with which Umditshwa put the matter to us. He did not attempt to conceal the fact of his having enemies. "How should we like it?" he asked, "if they came and burned our house?" Mr. Gordon, who was the chief speaker, answered that we should trust in God. It appears that they had a missionary once, a Wesleyan, a very excellent man, I believe, who was killed one night accidentally by a party of hostile Kaffirs, who had come, I think, to carry off the cattle. He went out, hearing a noise, to the kraal where they were, and was stabbed in the dark. The chief whose people did this paid, or offered to pay, 100 head of cattle. The next point was, where should we settle? Three places were named, and on the following morning we went to visit the one most highly recommended. It is a valley, well watered, with some, but not much, timber, and most excellent pasture and soil, and, I believe, tolerably accessible for a waggon. It lies very high, and is very cold, but to us that is rather a recommendation. We sent a message to say that we were satisfied, but would fix the actual site on our next visit. Umditshwa had pressed us to say when we should come to live there—in the winter, or planting time, or at the new year ; we named the planting time—i.e., about August. I have forgotten to say that at present this valley is quite uninhabited ; the people are afraid of the Tambookies, but as soon as we go there they will come ; wherever we went they would come, as we should be their "strength!" Our guides, who accompanied us to show us the valley, said on parting, "Come soon." That night we slept out by a river, a tributary of the Tsitsa, and reached home late on the following day. We were all roughly satisfied with the expedition, but most of all with our future chief. When I think of our troubles, and the noble way in which he has borne up against them, I cannot but hope that they may be the means of giving him some higher source of consolation than he can have as a heathen, in spite of the difficulties which are known to attend the conversion of a Kaffir chief.

At the Cape, in May last, in the midst of a hurricane scarcely paralleled in the colonial annals, a fire suddenly burst forth at Swellendam, which defied every effort to restrain its violence. The Wesleyan chapel, with all its woodwork and internal fittings, shared the general fate, together with the adjoining mission-house ; in which, likewise, nearly the whole of the furniture of the resident minister's personal effects were consumed.

WEST INDIES.

To the revival which prevailed in Jamaica some few years ago has succeeded a state of stagnation which raises the question, amongst a class of the people, as to whether Christian missions have not, to some extent, been a failure in that island. Some of the Jamaica papers allege that the people, instead of advancing, are retrograding, and that missions were formerly more successful than they are now. Upon this subject, the Rev. James Watson, the oldest missionary of the United Presbyterian Church in Jamaica, remarks that those who hold these opinions forget that the heathen—the uninstructed portion of the population—are more than twice as numerous as those in connexion with the churches :—

Out of a population of 441,248, there are only 127,978 who attend any place of religious worship. The whole number of children in the colony attending any day or evening school is only 2,270. More than half the population of Jamaica are still nominally heathen. It is true much has been done, many missionaries and ministers labour among the people; but still it is as true that thousands of the population do not avail themselves of the Gospel, though placed within its reach. There are 200 ministers and missionaries in the island. Those 200 ministers divide amongst them something less than 800 people each, whereas, if reaching the whole population, they would have a charge of over 2,200 souls. This proves that thousands do not avail themselves of the means of religious instruction; and of the 154,285 said to be under religious instruction, the must be a large abatement made for the merely nominal professor, the careless, the indifferent, the backsliding, and children. When these deductions are made, the number under the influence of religion would not much exceed 100,000—not one fourth part of the population. Then, if we view the whole island in regard to religion, and if only a fourth part of it has felt the evangelising power of the Gospel, need we be at all surprised that sin and immorality should be in the ascendant? Before freedom there were no penitentiaries. Crimes were punished on the spot except murder. Every estate had its own prison, judge, and jury. The amount of crime then was unknown, and it is unfair to compare the past and the present in this respect. It is not the fact that the religious portion of the community are retrograding or deteriorating; but the vicious, criminal, and the ignorant, being more numerous, neutralise the good that has already been done, cast it into the background, and, in fact, give character to the whole island population. The good that has been done maintains its place and its standing in the locality where it exists. There is palpable in the pure and blameless lives of thousands who have been redeemed from vice and ignorance through the instrumentality of missions. But beyond the pale of this holy life-giving influence there are thefts and robberies, drunkenness, vice, and crime. Beyond such localities blessed by faithful labours of Christian missionaries, there are idleness, licentiousness, cunning, malice, a crime of every phase, rampant and strong, and setting at defiance decency, law, and religion. It is plain that the outstanding heathenism of 300,000 people must to some extent neutralise and into the shade the character and conduct of the 100,000 who have embraced Christianity, but it is altogether unfair to reason from such premises that missions have been a failure in Jamaica. I do not care much about men's opinion; I know that the lives and deathbed scenes of multitudes attest the great success of the Gospel in Jamaica; and I know also that, even within the last twelve months, bad and wicked as this city is, there have been sound and saving conversions in

The Baptist Missionary Society announces the decease of the Rev. Mr. Rycroft, agent for twenty years in Turks' Island (Bahamas), a few weeks after the death of Dr. Rycroft. From another quarter the society receives the news that the Rev. Mr. Diboll, who had recently undertaken the superintendence of its mission at Sierra Leone, and whose arrival there last January was hailed by the native Christians with exceeding joy, has been carried off in three days by the fevers of that deadly region.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The Allen Gardiner has lately arrived from Keppel Island, having on board six young natives of Terra del Fuego, brought over by the Rev. Waite H. Stirling, but at their own earnest desire. These lads have not been baptized, nor are they so far advanced in Christian instruction as some of the married natives now under training at the South American Society's station in Keppel Island, in the West Falklands; nevertheless they have acquired an elementary knowledge of Christian doctrine, and their whole conduct shows how amenable they are to good influences. Mr. Stirling attended the recent meeting of the British Association, read one of the papers in the Geographical Section and introduced the four boys to the meeting. He stated that they were good, affectionate, dutiful, and trustworthy.

Religious toleration has recently made a step forward in Chili, the Chamber of Deputies having passed a bill allowing non-Romanists freedom of worship, and the right of establishing private schools for the instruction of their children in the tenets of their own religion. The following are the details which appear in the Panama Star on the subject:—

Last mail we gave an account of the attitude which the country had assumed in the question of religious toleration, now under debate, and which finds defenders in some of the most intelligent and enlightened men in Congress, in the press, and, indeed, in all circles; the only dissenting voices being those who are professedly under the rule of the clergy. Unfortunately, the Government appeared in the clerical lines. Religious freedom terrifies the people of Chili, and reasonably so; not because it would weaken the Catholic sentiment of the country, so deeply rooted in the Chilean heart, but because that measure would impose on it an earnest devotion to its spiritual duties, and the necessity of enlightening itself in order to meet its enemies, and that of walking in the path of Christian charity and humility, from which our clergy so often deviate. The Government, which at first stood by the most radical of the intolerant clique, has begun to make concessions to liberty. Avoiding a too apparent and complete change, it has sought a way on which are for as it thinks, all the guarantees asked for the dissentient worshippers, while it compromises the intolerance by allowing the 5th Article to stand. The following was the manner in which the Government intimated its plan of operations. A Bill of Interpretation emanating from the Executive was presented to the Senate. The bill is as follows: "Art. 1. It is declared that by the Article of the Constitution those who do not profess the Roman Catholic religion are allowed to offer their worship within the precincts of chapels or edifices of individual property. Art. 2. Dissenters are allowed to found and establish private schools for instructing their own children in the doctrine of their religion." The majority of the members, knowing the contents of the bill, and it a speedy passage through the Senate, after only erasing the word "chapel." The bill was under discussion in the Chamber of Deputies the same day that it had been passed in the Senate, and was at once accepted by the Chamber. Free worship, which has existed in fact in some of the towns in Chili, more especially in Valparaiso, will have acquired the legal sanction which it lacked, and edifices of all denominations may be put up and protected by law. No greater proof of the advancement of Chili in civilisation and knowledge exists than the attitude which the majority of her people have assumed in this important question, and it is to be hoped that the good example she has set will be followed by her sister republics of South America.

AUSTRALIA.

Encouraging accounts have been received from the Moravian missionaries as to their arduous work among the aborigines. The converts walk worthy of their high calling, not bringing reproach on the cause which they have espoused; some young people are coming forward as candidates for baptism, and the schools have been attended in a manner that gives good reason to hope for the future. The following passage from one of the brethren's letters affords a glimpse of their missionary life:—

Our two visiting brethren, Kramer and Kuehn, live in a house made of bark, adjoining the "store," the interior being whitewashed with a mixture which Brother Kramer concocted from white soil from the lake. When all was prepared for making use of the structure as a dwelling, we arranged a social festivity, to which all the blacks and our white neighbours were invited. Tea and bread were provided for the guests, in whose personal appearance a very striking and pleasing distinction was noticeable. Our "awakened" young men were clean and neatly dressed, while the others showed various shades of civilisation down to the condition of the complete savage. Our European friends would have been amused, if they had been present, to have seen an old black woman seated by my side, clothed merely in a single cotton garment, and with a wisp of hay wound round her head, but evidently greatly enjoying the festivity. Nothing further has been decided with reference to the field of labour to be occupied by the brethren who have just come out, but they are zealously preparing in every way for a life in the bush. Besides making themselves thoroughly acquainted with the missionary's work in teaching the poor savages, they are training themselves for a life with them, practising riding, boating, &c., and accompanying the natives on their fishing and hunting expeditions.

The amount of success already accomplished has induced the Melbourne Committee in aid of Moravian Missions to commence a new mission among the wild tribes residing in the district of Cooper's Creek.

POLYNESIA.

The eagerness of the people to obtain the Word of God is a marked feature in the accounts from Samoa. The Rev. A. W. Murray, of Upolu, states that a few weeks before, on visiting another island, he had taken a case of Bibles, that they were all bought up in about a week, and that many more might have been sold if he had had them. Since the time referred to, another shipment of 2,000 copies had been received, and a further supply had been sent, which was being eagerly bought up. Mr. Murray had conversed with about 116 candidates in this district (Faasaleleaga), about sixty of whom were admitted to the different churches. The liberality of the natives of Upolu deserves notice. They raised, for religious objects, ordinary and special, in connexion with the London Society, last year, no less than 513*l.* 19*s.*

One of the oldest labourers in the South Pacific—the Rev. George Platt, of Raiatea—has entered his rest. Mr. Platt had laboured there and in the neighbouring islands for half a century, and had witnessed their wonderful transformation, by the power and grace of God, from a state of the grossest idolatry and barbarism into that of peaceful Christian communities. His end was peace. Among the mourners at his funeral were Tamatoa, the King, Pomare, the Prince Consort of Tahiti, his son, the governors, &c. The King, we are told, has issued an order that there be a general mourning throughout the island.

One of the missionaries of the American Board—the Rev. A. A. Sturges—who has been labouring single-handed in Ascension Island (Caroline Group), gives most interesting and remarkable details of the advance which has been made there by Christianity. The native Christians, with all their ignorance and weakness, go "everywhere, preaching the word;" the missionary speaks of himself as constantly moving over the island. During a few weeks Mr. S. had baptized 74 individuals. His brief report, summing up results for something more than two years, mentions the addition of 139 persons to the church, at different places. Three houses of worship have been completed and dedicated (not including a large feast-house, fitted up and dedicated as a chapel), another, "large and substantial," is nearly completed, and preparations are making for the erection of still another. Three high chiefs are specially mentioned, who, with all their people, have abandoned heathen rites and joined the Christians. The first converts on the island were baptized in November, 1860.

A Memoir of the Rev. Richard Davis, for Thirty-nine Years a Missionary in New Zealand. By the Rev. J. N. COLEMAN, M.A. Nisbet & Co.

THE multiplication of Christian biographies is due to a variety of causes: surviving friends wish to possess and study permanent memorials of the departed whom they have loved and honoured; or, it is thought that the annals of a good man's life may teach and stimulate others to aim at like goodness as well as to respect it. Sometimes a biography is called for on public grounds, and it is felt that the life of a man who has left his impress upon his country or his age ought to be written. We may say that all these causes have combined to call forth the memoir of Mr. Davis. In it those who knew him may still hold converse with him; those who knew him not, may see what a good man is; and all may learn how important his labours were in behalf of that Maori race which is now passing through so perilous an ordeal. With respect to this last point, it is very apparent that the name of Mr. Davis ought to be inseparably connected with New Zealand history. Mr. Coleman, who has performed his part in a most excellent and praiseworthy manner, truly says: "His missionary operations exhibit a graphic portraiture of the New Zealanders in their cannibalism and savage barbarism—of native superstitions, native atrocities, native diseases, native remedies, native cooking, native fortifications, and the dedication to the Devil of Maori infants by native baptism—in his time universal, now rapidly passing into oblivion." We cannot profess to enumerate the various points upon which information is given in this book, which is a deeply-interesting one, and as such cannot fail to find acceptance with a large circle of readers.

The Wisdom of our Fathers: Selections from the Writings of Thomas Fuller. The Religious Tract Society.

THE "wit and wisdom" of the author of the "Worthies of England" well deserve a place in this series beside the philosophy of Bacon and the meditative piety of Leighton. A memoir, which equally avoids the extremes of undue brevity and prolixity, is prefixed to the selections from Fuller's works. These selections are chiefly taken from the "Good Thoughts," from "Bad" and "Worse Times," the "Cause and Cure of a Wounded Conscience" (these three works being given almost in extenso), and the "Holy and Profane State." We cannot grudge any of the space thus employed; yet that the extracts from his "Church History," "Worthies of England," sermons, expositions, and minor treatises, should be limited to scarcely more than a dozen pages, will hardly satisfy those to whom Fuller is, as it were, an old and familiar friend. This volume, however, can hardly fail to increase the number of his admirers.

The Gospel at Philippi, and other Serms Preached in St. Matthias's Church, Dublin. By the Rev. MAURICE F. DAY, M.A. Dobbs Herbert.

THE sermons contained in this volume were preached by the author in the regular course of his ministry. The first eight are based upon a narrative which records the circumstances attending, and following the proclamation of the Gospel at Philippi, as we read it in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts. The remaining sixteen discourses are of a more miscellaneous character, and relate to sundry important points of Christian faith and practice. Observing the tendency of some minds towards infidelity, and others towards Rome, the author has believed he would best counteract error by the simple exhibition of the truth as it is in Jesus. In belief we share; and when, as in the case before us, the truth is clearly and faithfully set forth, we confidently look for salutary results. Mr. Day is greatly anxious for the welfare of souls of the people committed to his care: these sermons persuade us that he is so anxious, and exhibits much judgment as to the choice of his topics as in the mode of treating them.

Christ and Man; or, God's Answer to Our Questions. By WILLIAM BATHGATE. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

A GLANCE at the contents of this work will show that it is concerned in numerous weighty subjects, which require to be handled with seriousness, discrimination, and firmness. It will soon become apparent to the reader that, to appreciate Mr. Bathgate's arguments, careful and close attention is necessary. This will be all the more needful, because there are certain peculiarities of style which border closely upon obscurity. For all that, it is plain that the book embodies large masses of thought upon momentous questions, and that it is a powerful vindication of the claims of Christ to our reverence, our confidence, and our love. In his own manner, which has as a decided originality, the author aims to bring the facts which prove the glory and sufficiency of Christ in various aspects and relations. In tracing and holding up to view some of the special lines of thought which characterize his age, he considers the Person and Offices of Christ, and then views Him in His relation to mankind to the individual, to the family, to the nation, to the State, to the Church, and to the spirit of the age. Having surveyed the wide field occupied the ideas, he adds a concluding chapter upon the truth in Christ attested by its adaptations and facts." We would not pledge ourselves to adopt every opinion advanced in this work, but regard it as embodying a great amount of vigorous, wholesome, and useful thought. There is something in it for most persons, but unquestionably it is specially a book for serious thinkers, and such can hardly fail to profit by it.

ITALY is passing through a crisis just now which her friends will regard with much interest. The Parliament has been dissolved, and preparations are making all over the country for a general election. For the first time since the constitution of the kingdom, the clergy have taken counsel together, and have resolved that it is their duty not only to take part in the contest themselves, but to guide their flocks also as to the votes they should give. Hence there is a fear on the part of some timid friends of the kingdom that their influence with the laity will so far prevail as to return a majority in their own favour, and to undo all the work of union that has been so painfully consolidated within the last ten years. It is forgotten that every one, priest or layman, who participates in the election, must take the oath of fidelity to the existing Constitution, and that their efforts, though they may retard, cannot prevent the growth of Italian liberty. The Ministers themselves appear to have no such fears; on the contrary, they boldly challenge the clerical party to do their worst, by announcing a programme of measures for the next Parliament, which, carried, will be fatal to priestly influence. They avow their intention to lay their hands on monastic institutions and ecclesiastical property in the land, and to make such re-distribution as will ameliorate the condition of the country clergymen on the one hand, while on the other it will provide for such a scheme of national education as shall be in accordance with the wants of the age.

The important questions bearing on the relations between the Emperor of the French and the Pope approach ever nearer to a settlement. One of the two years to which the stay of the French garrison in Rome was limited has nearly passed away, and there has been no indication of any faltering of purpose on the part of Louis Napoleon. The Pope, on the other hand, has shown certain indications of a disposition to increase the Papal army; but the failure of these attempts has been so decided, that the friends of his Holiness are inclined to represent that the only object of the recruiting was to fill up the gaps in the small force now at the disposal of the Pope. Turning to the side of the Protestants in France, we find an ever-increasing reason to deplore that the internal dissensions in that body should so weaken its strength and cripple its energies. It must needs be, however, that offences come; and we are glad that, since this is so, the cause of orthodoxy is so admirably upheld by the publications of the friends of that party, as is shown by our correspondence.

The Emperor of Austria has taken a step which is likely to have important consequences. Some four or five years ago he issued an Imperial decree conferring upon his subjects constitutional and representative privileges, but at the same time fusing, or rather attempting to fuse, all the different nationalities of his dominions into one people. Hungary and Croatia steadily resisted his plans, giving as a reason, that they preferred their old national liberties to others, conferred by the decree of a sovereign, and which another decree might take away. Their foresight has so far proved accurate; for the Emperor has now, by Imperial decree, suspended his constitution, and Austria is for the moment governed at his will. But his object is, as he states, to learn what the different nationalities require to form his empire on the plan of a Confederation, rather than of a fusion, leaving to each country its own local government, and forming a central House of Representatives for the discussion only of those questions in which all have an equal interest.

We learn from Abyssinia that Consul Cameron has been released from prison by the Emperor, but that he is not allowed to leave the country. Of the missionaries, Messrs. Fern and Rosenthal, we learn nothing, and the presumption is that they are still in custody. HOME.

We are again brought round to that season when we are c providence of the Lord in crowning the year with His goodness. T completed in all parts of the country, and we are in a condition t quality. The general opinion is, that though not equal to the exub years, still the cereal crops may be described as verging close upon actually reaching it. In the matter of food for the cattle there is n But though there is thus food in the land both for man and beas Almighty are manifest in that mysterious disease which has a which, though it has now been in the country for more than a m to be dealt with as ever, and, we are sorry to add, as rampa no signs of abatement anywhere; on the contrary, the plague into districts which had hitherto been free from it, and no mo or cure has yet been discovered. The most experienced and ski have been consulted on the subject; but their advice amounts pract off from us ; and we may hope that, in accordance with its former course, its virulence will be checked by the approach of the cold season.

It reads like an absurd dream, but it is true, nevertheless, that to our other troubles here was nearly added that last and worst of all, a civil war within our borders. Nay, we know not that the danger has yet altogether passed away, and as to the chances of success for the insurgents, they are not more hopeless than they were from the first. For some time past, the Irish newspapers contained accounts of a secret organization called the Fenian Brotherhood, which seems to have had its origin among the Irishmen in America, but whose object was to drive the English, the Protestant clergy, and the landholders out of Ireland, and to establish an Irish republic. The plan, of course, required that there should be agents and co-operators in Ireland ; and, accordingly, a secret organization was formed, with all the usual paraphernalia of treason—illegal oaths, secret passwords, mysterious meetings, and nightly drill. This went on for some time, and peaceable people, especially those in country districts, became alarmed at the prospect of an insurrection. In the meantime the Government—who appear to have been kept fully informed by treacherous members of the conspiracy of all that was going on—made a swoop upon the leading members in Dublin and Cork some time towards the close of the month ; and in one night about thirty prisoners were in their hands, including the editor and several contributors to the Fenian organ, the Irish People, whose types, &c., they also seized, and thus broke up the press. Since then several arrests have been made from time to time ; and whatever may be thought of the ramifications of the conspiracy, it is satisfactory to find that no person of slightest consideration or rank in society appears to have taken part in it.

As is usual in all such cases, great credit is given to the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy for their discouragement of this seditious movement. It seems to be taken for granted that they are the natural patrons of every effort that is hostile to the British Crown, and extravagant praise is assigned to them whenever they show a loyal spirit. In this instance, it would appear, they are to be more than praised, they are to be paid. Our readers will remember that at the close of the last session of Parliament, a discussion took place in the House of Commons on the subject of granting a charter to the Roman Catholic College in Dublin—an institution which was formed some years ago to give the Roman Catholic youth

Ireland an ultramontane education, but which has languished ever since for want of funds, the Irish gentry being either too parsimonious or too shrewd to afford it their support. It was thought that a new stimulus would be given to it if its council were enabled, by means of a Royal charter, to grant diplomas and degrees ; but to this the Government refused its assent, as it would be contrary to their policy of a mixed education in Ireland. Sir George Grey, however, offered that, if arrangements could be made, the students of the Roman Catholic University should be allowed to compete for degrees, on the same terms as the students of the four Queen's Colleges. The friends of united education regretted this decision, as it was setting a precedent of a merely sectarian institution obtaining a privilege over all the others ; but for the sake of peace, and in the hope that it would satisfy the claims of the Roman Catholic body, they did not raise much objection. But within the last few weeks it has oozed out that the designs of the Government have been greatly expanded, and that they go now much further than when Sir George Grey made his statement in the House of Commons. A meeting of the Romish bishops was held some time ago in Dublin to consider the question, and, after a general approval of the Government scheme on certain conditions, it was left to the archbishops to negotiate with the Government as to those conditions. Three of the archbishops—for Dr. M'Hale, the fourth, refused to act—had an interview with the authorities, and came to an agreement with them on the subject. The terms of that agreement are stated, in the Roman Catholic journals, to be, that the college is to be managed by a council of laymen, nominated by the bishops and approved by the Government, and that Government is to contribute to the institution an endowment of 25,000*l.* a-year. If this be true, it is time that the Protestants of the country were stirring. Here is another Maynooth to be constituted, with even less excuse than for the old one.

The Queen arrived in England early in the month from the inauguration of her late husband's statue at Coburg. She appears to have mixed pretty freely with the people of that quiet country town ; but immediately on again reaching her own country her desire for seclusion returned. Her Majesty, after a short stay at Windsor, has gone to Balmoral, and thither the Prince and Princess of Wales have followed her.

Evangelical Alliance.

WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

JANUARY 7—14, 1886.

THE beginning of this year, as that of previous years, was marked by the gathering of Christ in all parts of the world for united prayer; and it was made abundantly clear that our Father heaven was, by His Holy Spirit, drawing His children together in love, that He might bless them.

The Evangelical Alliance, by its British and Foreign Organizations, would again affectionately and earnestly invite Christians in all countries to make arrangements for meeting during the Week of Prayer, at the commencement of the New Year.

Much encouragement is felt from the fact that in almost every land, even the most remote, previous invitations have been largely responded to, and multitudes have acknowledged, with devout thankfulness to God, His gracious answers in "crowning the year with His goodness," conferring special blessings upon the Church and upon the world.

Let us again set apart the week beginning with the first Lord's-day of the New Year for our supplication, with thanksgiving, in the spirit of love, and in sympathy with our brethren who every place call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, both theirs and ours." Surely the result is great. Error is abounding; masses are ignorant of the Gospel; the children of God are still from manifesting the unity of the body of Christ—and whether as nations, or families, or in individuals, we have urgent dangers. Meanwhile, our Heavenly Father is ready to supply all our needs according to the riches of His grace, and not only to keep us secure from all harm, but is able and willing "to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." May we not confidently expect that suitable blessings will be bestowed in proportion as prayer is offered with "one accord by those who are united by a common faith, and who share in the blessings of a common salvation?"

O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come.—Psalms lxxv. 2.

The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon Him, to all that call upon Him in truth.—Psalms cxl.

And the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of Hosts: I will go also.—Zech. viii. 21.

Seeing, then, that we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God—let us therefore come boldly unto the Throne of Grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help us in time of need.—Heb. iv. 14—16.

Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all vigilance and supplication for all saints.—Eph. vi. 18.

The following topics, amongst others, are suggested as suitable for exhortation and intercession on the successive days of meeting:—

Sunday, Jan. 7.—Sermons on the duties of Christians to each other, as members of the Church of Christ.

Monday, Jan. 8.—Acknowledgment of Divine mercies and confession of sin.

Tuesday, Jan. 9.—The Christian Church: That its testimony may be clearer, its faith stronger, and its devotedness, liberality, and zeal enlarged.

Wednesday, Jan. 10.—Nations: For their temporal and spiritual welfare; for kings, and for authority; for the maintenance of peace; and for the increase of "righteousness, which exalteth a nation."

Thursday, Jan. 11.—For Christian Families, for Servants, and for Schools and Colleges.

Friday, Jan. 12.—For Christian Missions and Ministers, and for all engaged in Christian work.

Saturday, Jan. 13.—For Christians in sorrow, in sickness, and in persecution: For the Widowed and the Orphan.

Sunday, Jan. 14.—Sermons: The Blessing to be expected from the manifested Union of Believers in all Countries.

THE HULL CONFERENCE.

THE city of Hull, though one of the most ancient and celebrated of the seaports of Great Britain, does not lie upon any of those main routes which the railway system of the country has made the ordinary path of travellers, nor can it be so much a centre of attraction to the public as London, Edinburgh, or Dublin. It is, therefore, gratifying to know that the Annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, which was held in Hull in the last days of September, was well attended both by members of the British Organization and from abroad. The public meetings were crowded, and a large proportion of those present enjoyed the always delightful personal converse which takes place at the more social gatherings of the Alliance. Certain of those faces, indeed, which used to beam most brightly with the blended radiance of Christian sympathy and brotherly love—those of a Bickersteth, an Eardley, an Angell James—were not seen at the meetings in Hull; but their spirit continues to animate the Alliance, and we may reverently say that they were looking down in spiritual sympathy upon the proceedings. On no occasion have the Conferences of the Alliance been pervaded by a more cordial and harmonious feeling; and the main object of the Organization—to promote and afford opportunity for expressing, not the intellectual agreement of logicians, but the heart-unity of Christians—was never more signally attained. The report, as it relates to both the general and financial affairs of the Alliance, proves it to be in a state of vigour and prosperity. More additions to the membership, both lay and clerical, have been made during the last year than in any corresponding period since the time when the Alliance was set on foot, and the finances are in a thoroughly healthful condition. On the whole, but for the regretted absence of one honoured name, to which appropriate reference was made in the concluding resolutions, we might look back upon this Annual Conference with unmingled satisfaction.

It will hardly be expected of us to enter upon a refutation of those objections which have from the first been made to the Alliance—objections with which Dr. Blackwood ably grappled in his opening address, which have been already combated in these columns, and which, though shown to be null and void a thousand times, are quite sure to be repeated by the cold and cynical worldling. One man starts up and declares, with flippant dogmatism, that the only alliance of Christians is that of the Catholic Church, as if in the present state of the world the sympathies of Christians were shut within the limits of ecclesiastical organization. That you “name the name of Christ” is no bond of unity unless you also name the name of the Church; and until, amid the thousand-fold complexities of ecclesiastical systems, you can decide that some one Church has an exclusive claim on your adherence and affection, you are debaïred from spiritual communion with your fellow-Christians! Is it not sufficiently obvious that the heart has its rights as well as the unresting, ever-arguing brain—that the affections have a freedom of their own to assert, a freedom which spurns the bonds of rigid intellectual agreement? Does not even logic command us to recognise the facts which underlie all theories, and is it not a fact that the Spirit of God draws from all denominations those who are His, and that the converting might of that Divine influence produces a substantial identity of Christian character in Churchman and Dissenter, Wesleyan and Congregationalist, Presbyterian and Baptist? Do not all ecclesiastical tongues and kindreds, Parthians and Medes and Elamites, when the transforming might of Divine

Dr. Blackwood's suggestion, that something more than the communion of individual Christians might now be attempted, is worthy of serious consideration. By the principles of the Alliance, he said, as at present understood, every true member of any branch of the Church visible is recognised as a brother in Christ. So far well; but was it now impossible to get those branches of the Church visible, or at least many of them, whose individual members already join in communion, "to confer together in one, and to act unitedly for the promotion of objects in which they were all agreed?" Should this prove practicable, he submitted that the united action of the various branches of the visible Evangelical Church would be more powerful by far than that of individuals united in the Alliance. The suggestion is worthy of Dr. Blackwood's large heart and thoroughly catholic spirit, but we confess our fear that it must still be pronounced "a devout imagination." Difficulties, formidable and numberless, spring up when it is the communion of Churches, not that of individuals, which we seek to compass. An individual is an individual; he speaks for himself, acts for himself; in responsibility and everything else, he is one. But to find the mere personality of Churches, their representative courts and authoritative organs, is a problem which Dr. Blackwood may be able to solve, but with which we should rather be excused from grappling. Of course, to begin with, we should not exclude from the communion of the universal Evangelical Church that denomination to which Dr. Blackwood belongs. But where is a person, a court, or a corporation to be found capable of acting representatively for the Church of England? Her Majesty is the visible head of the Church, and if communion with Her Majesty could be regarded as communion with the Church of England, sure enough are we that no narrowness of spirit or lack of Christian charity would prevent our Sovereign Lady from entering into fellowship with any branch of the Church of Christ. Yet we dare say that Dr. Blackwood would not entertain the idea of soliciting Her Majesty to put her ecclesiastical supremacy to this novel use and application. Will he refer us to the Bench of Bishops? With all respect for that venerable institution, we doubt whether a favourable response would be received. No bishop, we much regret to say, is individually a member of the Alliance, and if, to say the least, our Episcopal fathers have shown no cordiality in embracing the opportunity of fellowship with individual Christians of other denominations, their zeal for communion between the Church of England and other Churches is not likely to be fervent. Shall we go to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council? The great body of the clergy will answer with an impatient No! To Convocation? It would, very probably, refuse to listen to us; if it did listen, and if the Evangelical party carried it over their more numerous influential High Church and Broad Church brethren, it would still remain a doubtful, if not an indeterminable question, in how far Convocation is empowered to act for the Church of England. Nor would the matter be without its difficulties on the Nonconformist side. He is, indeed, a bigoted Nonconformist who hesitates to admit that there are true Christians, members of the invisible Church of Christ, within the pale of the Established Church; but it is a matter of conscience for many Nonconformists to deny that an endowed Church, governed in the last resort by the Privy Council and the Estates of Parliament, can be pronounced Evangelical. Turning to the Baptists and Congregationalists, we should have as much difficulty in defining ecclesiastical personality as in the case of the Church of England. Does Dr. Blackwood propose communion with some three thousand Churches, as such, in England alone? Every Independent and Baptist congregation claims to be in the full sense a Church. If we went to the Presbyterians and Wesleyans, we should still be confronted with difficulties which, if removable at all, could be removed only in the course of years.

is just, though we are not sure that he goes far enough in his censures. There are religionists not a few, who not only look upon science with timorous distrust, but entertain an ill-masked repugnance to all in criticism, in ethical, in natural learning, in theological opinion, by which the nineteenth century is distinguished from the seventeenth. There might be some difficulty in deciding whether the too broad or the too narrow section of religious society does the greater

We have only to allude, in conclusion, to the anticipated Conference of the Alliance to be held next year in Amsterdam. The deputation from Holland gave a very interesting statement of the interest taken by their countrymen in the subject, and of the probable influence which would be exercised by the Conference. None of our annual meetings of the Alliance have been more successful in every sense than the last, which have taken place on the Continent; and at the present moment, when the social progress is bringing with it an extraordinary licence and audacity of opinion, and amid the indefatigable activity of Romanism and the towering arrogance of Ultramontanism and infidelity, the still small voice of the Gospel is apt to be lost in the crowd.—it is of profound importance that those who continue to maintain upon the Continent of Europe the essential, unchanging truths of Christianity, should be aware that the sympathy felt for them in Great Britain, and should know that in the first of our sister countries Protestantism has not become the synonyme of materialism, of naturalism, or anything but the simple, blessed Gospel once delivered to the

THE GREAT ASIATIC REVOLUTION IN THE AGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

The English of the nineteenth century, even of the more instructed classes, feel in general but a faint interest in any political convulsions which occurred so long ago as the seventh century before Christ. The idea of many persons probably is that the East is so far removed from us in the distance of remote antiquity, that it is not worth the trouble to know with exactness the things which then happened; and that even if we could certainly know the course of events, and could form a highly-coloured picture of the mind of the world of that day, such knowledge would be unprofitable to the people whose business belongs to a far more tangible scene of existence in the present times. It is necessary to explode both of these erroneous notions before we can proceed any farther in our present purpose.

The epoch which we describe as the age of Nebuchadnezzar extends over the years from B.C. 625 to B.C. 565, a period which includes the reign of his father, Nabopolassar. This is 2,450 years ago, a space of time which would be spoken of by many persons as numbering the days of hundreds of generations. This is, however, a popular delusion, tending to throw a needless doubt over all ancient history. The real space covered by these 2,450 years will be best estimated by comparing lifetimes. We have all known persons of nearly one hundred years of age. If four such lifetimes will carry us back to the age of Nebuchadnezzar. If we could seat on twenty-four chairs all the old persons whose united ages would amount to 2,400 years, we could go back to the time of the Babylonian Empire. So much for the "hundreds of generations," and the unfathomably deep antiquity!

We have seen the chief political events of that age we know as exactly, and can describe them as fully, as the events of the last century; and very wonderful events they were, which, when constituted together one of those great secular revolutions which determine the course of history for many following centuries. For over that part of the world which stretches westward from the Persian Gulf and the Tigris to the Straits inland, and formed little islands at a small distance from the shore, which are not worthy of note than the mainland itself, being everywhere covered with extensive vines and flourishing cities. Thus Aradus was built on one of these islands, and the shore opposite, Antaradus. Eighteen miles south stands Tripolis; at a like distance Byblus, with the temple of Adonis; and further south Berytus, now Beirut. Keeping along the coast, we come to Sidon, the most ancient of these Phœnician settlements, so called after the firstborn of Canaan; and finally, fourteen miles lower down, at the extreme south, where Phœnicia joins Palestine, stands the lovely Tyre, the queen of the Mediterranean. The spaces between these cities are filled with smaller towns and inland settlements, forming, as it were, one unbroken chain; whose lights flashed, when seen by night from the mountains, almost in one continuous blaze extending over the whole coast and the islands. In the background a beautiful range of Lebanon is overgrown with forests, and at the base the hills are excavated in numberless quarries.

The strip of country before us is the busiest scene on the face of the earth. It resembles like a great beehive—in the cities, in the villages, in the quarries, in the forests on the mountain-sides, in the harbours—with one of the most remarkable and powerful races of the ancient world. These Phœnicians are the Englishmen of antiquity. They speak a language not unlike the Hebrew, and they have an Asiatic aspect. But, inclosed and overcrowded in their narrow territory, which supplies them with scarcely any corn, partly by natural genius and partly by necessity, they have become great manufacturers, dyers in purple, merchant princes, shipbuilders, great workers in trinketry, great cultivators of the fine and of the useful arts, and above all, great colonisers and brokers; for they command and direct the commerce of Europe and Asia. For a thousand years these skilful, enterprising people have been building up the fabric of their marvellous power, wealth, and grandeur. Tyre and Sidon are their London and Liverpool. These cities are filled with stately edifices, marble palaces of their kings, ceiled with cedar, temples of their gods, plated with gold—one far-renowned temple of Hercules, Tyre, being a miracle of splendour and magnificence—mansions of their merchant princes, and the crowded homes of a flourishing population. All that the world can furnish of riches and beauty in the arts of production is to be found along this brilliant shore. Three great lines of inland traffic—one northward to Asia Minor and Armenia, one eastward to the Tigris and Euphrates, and one southward to Egypt and Arabia—conducted by multitudes of caravans, bring the wealth of the interior to a focus in Tyre for export to Europe and Africa. Two great lines of land and sea-trade along the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean, conducted by their incomparable fleets of merchantmen, bring the riches of the West, from as far as Cornwall and Gibraltar to the Isle of Cyprus, and the wealth of Africa, from Morocco to the coast of Egypt, to the same vast emporium, in order to be subsequently transported into the interior of Asia.

The pages of Ezekiel supply an imperishable picture of this wonderful Tyrian commerce. The hoarse songs of their multitudinous caravan drivers, the "cries" of their sailors as they heaved the anchor or spread the sail, the music and the bustling traffic of their great cities, the hum of their bazaars, filled with the wealth of all nations, still echo in our ears. Here, inland, along the northern coast, come gangs of slaves from Georgia and the Caucasus; for these reckless traffickers are great slave-dealers. "Tubal and Meshech send slaves and vessels of silver, and Togarmah gave thee horses and mules for thy wares." Along the middle coast comes corn from Palestine, with honey, oil, and balm. "Damascus trades for great riches in wine from Chalybon," and in wool from the flocks of the desert.

Halfway between the sea and the Euphrates stands Tadmor in the Wilderness, halting-place for the thirsty caravans. King Solomon built it. From the south through Idumea and Petra, comes all the wealth of Arabia and of the distant East; frankincense, myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, spices, for sacred rites; gold and precious stones, the rubies and onyxes of Ceylon, carbuncles, agates, and corals; diamonds of India, the horns, the ebony, the ivory of Ethiopia, the embroidered robes of Babylon, the sword-blades of Yemen, and blue mantles from the looms of Kedar and Dedan.

These lines of inland traffic form, however, but one-half of the Phœnician commerce; for see, the miles of wharfrage along this wealthy shore are covered with chests bound with cords, and "made of cedar," ready for export to a thousand stations around the Mediterranean Sea. The well-built harbours are crowded with shipping. Forests of masts are seen close at hand, and others dimly fading into the horizon. Many of those vessels are masterpieces of shipbuilding. Benches of box inlaid with ivory, flags of fine linen embroidered in scarlet and blue, white sails of bright Egyptian canvas, and awnings of purple, made them "very glorious in the midst of the sea." The Mediterranean is covered with their lofty ships. Three hundred Phœnic colonies along the African coast, Carthage at their head, depend for their supply upon commerce with their mother country. Asia Minor, the Archipelago, Peloponnesus, and Northern Greece, open their piratical ports to the Tyrian adventurers, who sometimes, like Cadmus, settle in Hellas, and bring arts and letters with their trade. They have rich settlements in Sicily, and a thriving trade with Italy; they have found their way to southern Spain, where gold was then as plentiful as silver is in Mexico; they have planted a distant colony where the wild citron blooms in Granada, and the wondrous moonlight smiles over the valleys of Seville. After having passed Gibraltar, they founded Cadiz, where the Atlantic breaks in thunder on the western shores of Europe, and pushed their adventurous prows into the latitudes of Madeira and Penzance.

The King of Tyre sits aloft, enthroned in his palace in the centre of this scene of splendour and power, "like a god in the midst of the sea." "By the greatness of his wisdom," and the wisdom of his ancestors for centuries, he has "multiplied his wealth," and thinks himself as glorious as an angel, while his diadem and royal robes shine with the topaz, the beryl, and the jasper, "like the anointed covering of a cherub." But he has corrupted his wisdom by reason of his brightness. Through the multitude of his iniquities, and the infinite villanies of his traffic, and the oppressions of his government, he has incurred the wrath of the King of kings. And the hour has come when that stupendous fabric of Phœnician power is to fall to the ground, when Tyre is to burn like a mountain of cedars in the midst of the water, and when the sceptre of the Mediterranean is to pass away to another race of men. The catastrophe is impending; but there are no signs of ruin as we look down upon the Phœnician shore. All are blind to their doom.

Such is our first tableau.

II.

It is still the spring of 625 B.C., and from our observatory in the Lebanon we look beyond the south of Tyre to the Holy Land. At the foot of the mountains is the Waters of Merom, whence issues the Jordan. We trace it like a silver thread to the blue Lake of Galilee, surrounded by hills, and thence again down its dark, deep trench to the burning hollow of the Dead Sea. To the right the hills rise and swell southward into the pleasant mountains of Ephraim, and still more in the canton of Judah, where, 3,000 feet high above the sea, stands in its glory the Holy City of Jerusalem. Towering above all other structures, shines in refulgent beauty temple of Solomon, with its lofty propylon; where, 500 years before, the wise friend of Hiram, surrounded by adoring thousands, had implored on bended knees, in the centre of the inclosure, the blessing of the Omnipotent, and received an answer by fire from heaven. There, in the sacred shrine, is still the Ark of the Covenant, which a thousand years ago Moses had made in the wilderness—the Ark before which the Jordan had divided, and the old nations of Canaan fled apace, when the “sun stood still in Gibeah, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon.” In the holy place beams the sevenfold light of the golden candlestick; and the ancient brazen altar flames, night and day, the heaven-descended fire. A round table of the Levites and the priests, the sons of Aaron; but the old spiritual flame is quenched, and Jerusalem is full of foreign fashions, learned from Tyre, from Egypt, and Assyria. Even altars to the host of heaven defile the surrounding heights, and the Majesty on High. Zion is covered with the venerable mansions of the nobles, and conspicuous stands the grey old palace of the kings of Judah, the descendants of David and Solomon. Beautiful for situation, encircled by groves and gardens, the metropolis of Judah gathers within her ample fortifications on the great Year’s festival of the Passover the many thousands of Israel. Their homes on the hills and valleys of Palestine are the seats of agricultural industry and husbandry. These hills are covered over with corn. The mountain sides are richly clothed with vineyards to their summits. The irrigation is perfected by centuries of labour. The antique farm-houses, built of stone, sit quietly under the shadows of the olive and fig-tree, and every square mile of the well-timbered territory is glorified by the history or monument of ancient heroism, or by the tradition of some solemn revelation from heaven. There is somewhat of the “form of godliness” remaining, but mingled with daring and grotesque imitations of the neighbouring paganisms. The prophets had, a hundred years ago, denounced the growing apostasy. Isaiah, with strains of awful grandeur as had never been heard on earth before, had called on heaven and earth to witness the sin of Judah, and pointed to the storm which hung on the horizon. But a worthless succession of princes and statesmen had perverted the national affairs, and the profane millions who abounded through the land had willingly yielded to the policy of siding now with Egypt against Assyria, now with Assyria against Egypt, until all confidence in God had died away. Wealth from wheat and oil trade with Phœnicia enriched the population, but they spent their wealth upon their pleasures, starved the ministers of God, and trampled in their drunken recklessness upon the rights of men. It was more than rumoured that the idolatrous worship of the Babylonian Astarté was ventured on by moonlight beneath the groves of Olivet by the daughters of Jerusalem, while the men mocked the warnings of God, and misused His prophets. Some they burned, and some they slew, until Jerusalem rang with the cry of violence, and her princes openly blasphemed the Creator of the world. Every plan had been laid for their separation from the nations, in order to the preservation of the true religion. On the east the Jordan, the Dead Sea, and the Syrian Desert, on the south the wilderness of Kadesh, the west the Mediterranean Sea, and the north the steep range of Lebanon, cut them off from easy access to foreign lands. “The people shall dwell in peace.” But this they could not endure. “Down to Egypt” they would go. With the assistance of Assyria and Babylonia they would maintain political and commercial independence; and now the result was seen in a depravity of manners dark enough to arouse the sleeping saints and patriarchs in Machpelah from their tombs to curse the nation, and in a spirit of profane rebellion against the Mosaic institutions, which had led through infidelity into all the monstrous crimes and horrors of heathenism.

At this very juncture, then, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, in which we suppose into prisons, executed on scaffolds, condemned to the most fearful punishment; and our age would witness atrocities comparable with those committed by the torturers of olden time upon the Albigenses and Protestants!

COURT OF ROME AND THE FRANCO-ITALIAN CONVENTION.

ated, some weeks since, that the fulfilment of the Franco-Italian treaty was in great uncertainty (Even. Chris., p.

But the state of things since then assumed a totally different aspect. The Government has officially announced that our troops will be recalled at the time stated, and significant measures have already been taken to bring back to France some battalions. The organs of the clerical hierarchy have been plunged by this news into a state of stupor. They always hoped that Napoleon III. would shrink from the responsibility of abandoning the Pope to his own fate, and that the Franco-Italian convention would be, at least for some years, a dead letter. Now this illusion is no longer maintained. The French garrison will leave Rome without the exception of a single company on the 15th September, 1866; and what will become of the Pope and his government? Some of the influential circles of Paris enter into the question as to what Pius IX. might and ought to do in this critical situation. The best course for him would unquestionably be to reconcile himself to himself by consenting to carry out these and extensive reforms in the political and civil legislation of the Roman Empire. He would thus acquire moral power, the gratitude of the people, the best means of preserving his authority. But will the Pope fulfil the part of a social reformer? No; in all probability that time has passed, and the Jesuits, who rule Rome, will not permit it. But will he, at least, attempt to form amicable relations with the kingdom of Italy? In such a state of things would be found a further means of glory or of protecting the position of the Holy See. The Italians set a high value on maintaining, under certain restrictions, the institution of the Papacy; because it is a source of influence, of importance, and even material advantage, as respects their country. But, I ask yet again, will the Jesuitical hierarchy adopt such a means of accommodation?

The last attempts at negotiation between Florence and Rome showed a tendency towards the opposite of this. The third course is to increase the Papal army, in order to repress by force and fear the explosion of liberal ideas in the Patrimony of St. Peter. It would seem that such is, in fact, the scheme of the majority of the cardinals and the Jesuits. The Sovereign Pontiff is endeavouring to raise recruits in his own dominions, in France, in Austria, in Belgium, and elsewhere. But will he be able to raise a sufficient number? Will he have wherewith to pay them? And, supposing these two conditions fulfilled, will the Papal soldiery be able to keep the citizens of Rome under the yoke of the priests? No reasonable man believes it. The Court of the Vatican is obviously on the eve of a terrible catastrophe, unless it be prepared to make timely and great concessions. Let us await events; they are in the hand of God.

DISRUPTURE BETWEEN THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS AND THE JESUITICAL FACTION.

I have before referred, on different occasions, to the opinions and character of M. Darboy, the diocesan of Paris. M. Darboy is an intelligent man, and a prelate of comparatively moderate opinions. Napoleon III. selected him for the office he fills expressly as a sort of medium in his views between Roman Catholicism and the spirit of modern times. M. Darboy has answered the Emperor's expectations. His discourses and acts, whether as Archbishop, Grand Chaplain, or senator, bear habitually the impress of moderation. Whilst faithful to the fundamental doctrines of his Church, he respects the rights of the civil power, and labours to obtain the confidence of men of enlightened understandings. In a word, M. Darboy is a Gallican prelate. This mode of speech and action is highly displeasing to the Jesuits, the Ultramontanes, and all the bigoted devotees of Rome. They do not dare openly to attack M. Darboy in their own organ, Le Monde, because they would thus draw down upon themselves the severities of the civil power; but they have recourse, according to their old custom, to perfidious insinuations, to secret intrigues, and to calumnies, more or less disguised, to injure the reputation of the Archbishop of Paris. Recently, this covert hostility has assumed a more offensive and public character. In the course of the month of September there was held what the Romanists call an ecclesiastical retreat; in other words, a gathering of all the curés and priests of the diocese, who, for several days, listened to the instructions of their spiritual leaders. Naturally, M. Darboy delivered several addresses on this occasion. Well, the Jesuitical faction have taken the opportunity to misrepresent the language of the Archbishop. They have pretended that M. Darboy, in these conferences, questioned the utility of the monastic orders, and suggested to the representatives of modern society an alliance which should subvert the principles and the traditions of the Roman Church. The Jesuits have even insinuated that the prelate had been blamed by the Pope, on account of his presence at the funeral of Marshal Magnan, one of the dignitaries of Freemasonry. The Archbishop, in reply, has addressed to the editor of Le Monde a brief but firm note, in which he denies these calumnious assertions. The Jesuits have published the note, without the addition of any hostile comment. But the quarrel remains, and is yet another proof that the unity of which Romanism so loudly boasts rests only upon vain appearances.

NARRATIVE OF A SURPRISING MIRACLE WROUGHT BY THE HOLY SACRAMENT.

The miracles attributed to the Virgin and the saints do not obtain much credit at the present time. Many of the Roman Catholics themselves, who observe with regularity the ordinances of their communion, experience shame and displeasure, rather than joy, on reading the recitals of the wonderful prodigies wrought by Our Lady of Salette, &c. But the Ultramontane party will not renounce these pious frauds, which serve to maintain the bigotry of the ignorant. Thus the Bishop of Metz has recently published, with much ostentation, the account of a Miracle wrought by the Holy Sacrament. This narrative is very long and particular, but I will give the substance of it in a few lines. Miss Anna de Cléry, aged twenty-three years, of an aristocratic family, was attacked long since by the most serious maladies. She had recourse to medical aid and learning, but the remedies prescribed by the most celebrated physicians produced no effect. Miss Anna continued to suffer greatly; she was paralysed, and incapable of moving either feet or hands. All hope of cure had been abandoned. Happily, she preserved an unshaken faith in the Holy Sacrament—that is to say, in the doctrine of transubstantiation, or the real presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper. One day, accordingly, this young lady requested to be carried by her servants to the cathedral of Metz; and there, having knelt before the Holy Sacrament, she prayed for three hours with great fervour. Then, marvellous to state, Miss Anna felt that a complete cure had been effected in her limbs. Suddenly she exclaimed, "I am cured!" In fact, this devout person had been miraculously delivered from all infirmities! No more paralysis, no suffering! She could actually walk with as much ease as you or I! This super-event has excited everywhere the greatest admiration, according to the testimony of M. Paul, Bishop of Metz, and even exclaims, "Let the most Holy Sacrament be praised and adored for ever!"

It would be superfluous to enter into a serious discussion upon such a story. I will observe that these miracles are always wrought upon young girls, who have a very ardent imagination and a nervous excitement. You will also not think this pretended prodigy is designed to establish the doctrine of transubstantiation, to which the Papacy attaches such high importance. All these considerations render this miraculous cure very suspicious. It is very probable that Miss Anna was cured by a very natural reaction; but what, to men of common sense, does this prove?

A RADICAL FRENCH PASTOR AT GENEVA.

If we consider the internal state of France, Protestantism, we find that controversies continue with the same vehemence; and the defenders of the Evangelical cause have to perform constantly great and arduous duties. An assistant pastor at Bordeaux, M. Pellissier, last month made an excursion to Switzerland, and whilst sojourning at Geneva, asked permission to preach in one of the pulpits of that city. After several applications, the authority was given, and M. Pellissier delivered a sermon to a numerous audience, drawn together mainly by curiosity. As I am writing in a magazine published in France, I abstain from pronouncing any judgment upon the opinions and the rhetorical method of this preacher, who generally speaks extempore, without adopting a logical order, or giving expression to any digested thoughts. I am only astonished that the Radical school should grant patronage to M. Pellissier. Since it inclines within its ranks such men as M. M. Copeaux, Colani, Reville, and Fontana, it ought to show more circumspection and reserve in the choice of its clients. However this may be, M. Pellissier plainly declared in one of his sermons at Geneva, that he rejected the supernatural element of Christianity, and did not at all believe in the miracles recorded the New Testament! This manifesto has reduced amongst the majority of the Christians and of the Consistory of Geneva a very strong feeling of disapproval and opposition. Here is the important point. Some pastors of the city of Calvin have been accused, it is true, of holding Socinian or Unitarian opinions. But neither their hearers, nor these pastors themselves, were prepared completely to deny the supernatural. They have therefore been, not only astonished, but scandalised; and the Consistory of Geneva has decided, almost unanimously, that M. Pellissier shall no longer have permission to preach in that city. This is a warning for the preachers of the Radical school in France. The National Church of Geneva accepts the principle of examination, but at the same time declares that the Word of God is the only infallible rule of faith and practice. This is the striction which the representatives of the Swiss Protestants will maintain against the Radicals.

DEBATES UPON THE RIGHTS OF PASTORS.

This affair has occasioned a discussion in our religious journals on the following question: "Has any pastor the right, on his own and sole responsibility, to grant the use of his pulpit to every speaker who may have received regular ordination?" The Radicals maintain the affirmative. They assert that the pastor is free to call to his pulpit, in our churches, all preachers who have the diploma of bachelor in theology, and are ordained ministers. The flocks can have no other guarantee; and men the most notoriously opposed to the leading doctrines of the Gospel must be admitted, with their official titles, to preach from our pulpits at the pleasure of each pastor. The Orthodox combat this strange pretension. They affirm that the right of inviting strange preachers to our pulpits pertains to the consistories, or to the legitimate representatives of the flocks. Here, then, is a principle of discipline, an element of order and liberty. The flocks are not to be served according to the variations and caprices of the pastors. They must retain the right of intervention in the public services, and of preventing believers, when attending on the worship of the National Church, from being exposed to listen to the rash negations of the new theology. In this, as in other cases, the Orthodox are the true defenders of liberty in the Church; for there is no liberty except as the people themselves decide, in the last resort, by the voice of their legally-chosen delegates.

APPROACHING EVANGELICAL CONFERENCES AT TOULOUSE.

A few words, in conclusion, respecting a solemn assembly of pastors and elders, which will take place on the 7th or 9th of next November, in the city of Toulouse. I reserve to my next letter the details I shall have to give respecting these Evangelical Conferences. Two important subjects will there be discussed. Professor Bois will inquire into the relation of the supernatural element to the Christian life. Pastor Castel will speak upon the formulary of ordination. May the Lord deign to shed His blessing upon this assembly!

GENERAL MEETING OF THE GUSTAVUS- ADOLPHUS SOCIETY AT DRESDEN.

The great and useful association which bears the name of Gustavus-Adolphus, and which, by means of its auxiliary societies, embraces all Germany, from the Baltic to the Alps, held its annual general meeting at Dresden, from the 5th to the 7th of September. Favoured with magnificent weather, his festival, to which the fair capital of Saxony lent its splendour, no less than the cordial hospitality of its inhabitants, and the participation of its people, was one of the most remarkable which the Gustavus-Adolphus Society has been able to record in its history. When, on the forenoon of September 6, the long array of members of the society, composed of hundreds of pastors, professors, and laymen of eminence in Church and State, civil and military authorities, and the youth from the schools, traversed the streets of the city amidst an eager and sympathetic multitude, everybody might have said to himself, "Here is an association which has struck its roots deep into the Protestant people of Germany, and for which a great future is in store." The general meeting is every year an abundant source of edification to the whole church in the city where it is held, by means of the religious services which take place over and above the proceedings of the meeting properly so called. Three eminent preachers had been chosen this year for these religious services—the Revs. Dr.

GENERAL MEETING OF ROMAN CATHOLIC SOCIETIES AT TREVES.

While the German Protestant Church was us represented during those delightful days

Dresden, Catholicism, represented by its ost zealous and most active adepts, opened few days later—the 11th of September—; annual sittings in the ancient city of reves, in the Rhine Provinces. Your aders know that these great meetings e made up of delegates from numerous ociations of Catholics which are employed on different works of beneficence, and which ery year unite for common conference. hey have at such times general public meet- gs, on the one hand; and on the other, sit- ngs in separate sections, each of which de- berates concerning a particular class of effort. e shall not here enter into the details of ese efforts, although even Evangelical Chris- ans might have much to learn there in the atter of activity, devotedness, and charity; nd we shall confine ourselves to describing n outline the public meetings, because in hem, above all, is manifested the spirit which unimates these associations.

The first meeting was held on September 11, in the evening. Members and spectators made up an assemblage of 1,200 persons. After the appointment of officers, the presi- dent, Herr von Andelaw, one of the nobles, umerous enough in Germany, who are the rops of Catholicism, delivered an address in hich he celebrated the unity of the Roman atholic Church, the image of which he saw n the Saviour's holy coat without seam, care- ully preserved, as we know, among the umerous relics of Treves Cathedral. It ust be confessed that the allusion was not a appy one, because it called to mind, at the utset of the meeting, the recollection of a uperstition which in 1847 provoked the ebrated letter of the priest Rongé, and was he starting-point of the separation of the 'German Catholics,' a sect which, however itiful, still exists. A member of the chapter f Mentz Cathedral, named Henrici, was not ore happy, when he made, at the same sit- ing, the eulogy of the last Papal Encyclical, hich he called "the great work of Pius IX." t was in vain that after his oration the as- embly shouted enthusiastically, three times, 'Long live the Pope!' All the world knows hat contemporary events are scarcely in har- mony with that enthusiasm. Other speakers ere more fortunate in the choice of their bjects; thus, Count Scherer, in pronouncing discourse on the memory of Father Theodo- us, a monk of Schwyz, famous for his labours on behalf of the working classes, and whose death recently caused a great sensation in the Catholic cantons of Switzerland; so also, the priest Ibach, in setting forth the praise of Goerres, the most ardent and the most able of Catholic controversialists in modern times.

The next day, at the public meeting in the morning, the great question of the press especially occupied the assembly. In spite of all the efforts of these societies, it is a notorious fact that the great political press of Germany is but little favourable to Ultra- montane Catholicism, even in the Catholic states. Most of the more influential journals are even strongly opposed to it, and it may be said that herein they are really the organs of public opinion. And it is impossible not to draw therefrom this conclusion—that people make a profound distinction between Catholi- cism as a religion and Ultramontaniam as a Papal system. Unfortunately, the higher clergy, and even the zealous associations now under notice, cannot or will not make this distinction.

The Treves assembly also had to listen to a report wherein was shown the necessity of giving up the scheme for founding at Frank- fort a central office for the Catholic press. Everything this required was lacking—inte- rest, money, and writers. All that was done, therefore, was to recommend the friends of the work not to subscribe to the "bad jour- nals," and not to read them.

At the evening meeting the assembly was occupied with what may be called the ex- citing question of the time—the great question contested between Church and State, both in the Protestant and in the Catholic Churches—the question of schools. Hitherto the school, although salaried by the State or by the com- munes, had been under the direction and influence of the Church. But now, almost everywhere, the State claims this direction and influence. Hence the conflict; and inasmuch as public instruction in Germany is obligatory, it amounts to a real monopoly on the part of the State wherever the Church has not the means or the liberty to found schools for itself. It must be owned that, in this state of things, the grievances of the Catholics are not unfounded. They say, that by compulsory instruction the State uses the money of Catholics in supporting institutions which often bring up youth in anti-Catholic prin- ciples. One speaker went so far as to say that it is an injustice to be prosecuted before the tribunals. Dr. von May, from the Tyrol, exclaimed that he did not understand why in the eighth. We well know that it is not easy to overcome prejudices and habits which have taken root among a whole class of men, but the consciousness of our own shortcomings, and the great responsibility resting on us, must not only give us the will, but also the courage, to overcome these difficulties. It is not possible to give general rules, as the circumstances in different places are so very different; but with true love and earnest fidelity we shall easily find the way and the means." The address is signed by sixty-four proprietors of great estates. We find among them the best names of our nobility—men known for their personal piety, also men holding high political offices, such as Count Stolberg, the President of our House of Lords, and Count Itzenplitz, our Minister for Trade.

But it is not only this which makes the address remarkable. It is a decided progress, even compared with the view which many faithful Christians take about the Sunday. What I think most important, however, is, that in this address a number of Christian laymen stand up publicly for the Lord's cause, in a way they never did before.

We must thankfully acknowledge that there is here a goodly number of those who have felt the love of Jesus in their hearts, but what we miss so much is activity for the Lord's kingdom. We want Christians to come forward more decidedly. We want them to be better trained into an army for Christ; and I think we may consider this address as a good beginning in that line. The question of the Sunday is now seriously attended to by many Christians. I must mention the meetings arranged periodically in different parts of the country, chiefly in the province of Saxony, by the indefatigable zeal of the Landrath von Kröcher. The last one took place in Gnadau, on the 26th of July, and those who were present consider it to have been very successful.

CLOSING OF SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

An important measure, bearing on the Lord's-day, has been adopted by our Government. There exist here so-called Sunday-schools (not to be confounded with the Christian Sunday-schools, which are a great blessing here as in England), in which young men, who are apprenticed before their schooling is completed, find an opportunity of continuing their education by attending classes which are held on Sunday morning during Divine service. By a decree of our Minister for Public Worship and Education, recently published, these classes, which gave offence to all earnest Christians, are forbidden, and must be closed at latest by the 1st of April, 1866.

GENERAL METHODIST CONFERENCE.

By the report which has just been published, we see that the tenth annual missionary conference of the Episcopal Methodist Church of Germany and Switzerland has taken place in Bremen, in June last. Besides Bishop Janes, nineteen clergymen were present. The church counts at present 3,465 full members, 613 more than the year before. They are divided into six districts—1. The district of Bremen, with Bremen, Brake, and Delmenhorst; 2. The district of Oldenburg, with Oldenburg, Hamburg, and Flensburg; 3. The Eastern district, with Berlin, Pomerania, and Saxony; 4. The Southern district, with Ludwigsburg, Carlsruhe, and Frankfort-on-Maine; 5. The Eastern Swiss district; 6. The Western Swiss district.

October 19.

THE CONFERENCES AT ELBERFELD.

Among the religious Conferences of this country, there is hardly one of so general an interest as those known here by the name of the Wupperthaler Festwoche. The valley of the Wupper, with its rich commercial towns of Elberfeld, Barmen, and Wupperfeld, is one of those blessed spots which the Lord has more especially designed to be a centre and focus of spiritual life. No Christian living in our Rhenish Provinces would like to be absent from there in the second week of August, when all the religious societies hold their anniversary meetings. From all parts of Germany Christians flock together at that period, and meet there in brotherly fellowship, and almost all return to their different vocations with new zeal for the Lord's kingdom, with warmer love to the brethren. This year the Conferences gained a more general interest still, by the fact that the fourth conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations of all countries was combined with them. The first of these Conferences had taken place in Paris, in 1855, together with the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance; the second one in Geneva, in 1859; the third in London, in 1862. Among the representatives of different countries, I must mention Dr. Gladstone and Mr. Shipton, from London; Mr. Tawse and Mr. Warren, from Edinburgh; Mr. Owen and Mr. Woolford, from Shrewsbury; Mr. Blaise, from Paris; Candidate Middendorf, from Geneva; Mr. Petersen, from Seraing, near Liege; Mr. Van Osterwyk Bruns, from Amsterdam; Mr. Kölliken, from Zurich;

means of founding a hundred associations in France.

On Sunday evening several suitable addresses were delivered, and the hearts of those who were present were once more warmed by accounts of the Lord's past blessings. Pastor Frommel, from Wüpperfeld, very cleverly showed how Daniel and his friends in Babylon had founded the first Young Men's Association, and Mr. Rüterik referred to the motto of these associations in America, "Let us stand up for Jesus." The representatives of the different countries were charged to convey the Christian greetings of the assembly to their brethren at home.

An excursion into the neighbourhood of Barmen, on Monday, August 14, terminated this series of meetings, on which I dwell rather long, because I think that their international character will render them of greater interest to your readers. I will not give you any details about the usual meetings which were held afterwards from Tuesday to Friday, as the subjects discussed were not of such general interest, and a short report cannot give you a sufficient idea of the blessings experienced from the intercourse with so many Christian brethren.

But I should like to engage those of your readers, whom the beauties of the Rhine draw to those parts of Germany in summer, to go and see for themselves the spiritual beauties of Elberfeld and Barmen, if they can manage to be disengaged in the second week of August.

ITALY.

In the accidental absence of our usual Italian correspondence, we quote the principal portion of an interesting, though in some respects painful communication which appears in the Guardian. It is dated "Florence, Oct. 14," and is written, as might be expected, from the Anglican standpoint. The writer professes to give only the results of his observation as a "passing traveller;" but his evidence, as that of a cautious and candid eyewitness, to whom the scenes he witnessed came with all the startling effect of novelty, is most impressive. He thus speaks of Italian

SUPERSTITION AND MARIOLATRY.

Italy has evidently not yet made up her own mind; how can any one decide for her what it will be? She has scarcely yet entertained the subject of religious reformation at all, certainly not seriously, nor as a nation. As far as the masses are concerned, it is easy to perceive that things are just as they were before, or rather worse. What we think ourselves justified in calling superstition is more rife than ever, and more openly paraded before the eye. There can be no mistake about that; you have but to look around to be convinced of the fact, and there need be no hesitation about asserting it. All other altars are deserted for the favourite one, and the Credo of the people, so far as their religious practice is concerned, might just as well be reduced to a single tenet. Even on a Sunday it is observable that High Mass itself no longer commands the attendance it once did, but has come to be regarded as something almost rococo, and is neglected for a newer and more attractive divinity. At the Cathedral of Florence High Mass now often goes on at the grand altar in presence only of a few curious strangers or lookers-on. The officiating priests themselves seem to be quite conscious that they have lost their audience on such occasions, and to feel as though they were going through a form that had become well-nigh obsolete. Nothing can exceed the rapidity with which the office is conducted. The vast band of performers wheels about with the celerity of a corps de ballet; and the business is got through and the long procession files off into the sacristy and disappears, in a way not at all usual with Roman Catholic ceremonies which are in vogue. The impression conveyed is that this most solemn celebration of divine worship and chief observance of the Sunday is fallen in popular estimation, and that the officiators are aware of it, and get through the prescribed ritual as fast as possible, as through a worn-out piece. Meanwhile, however, at precisely the same hour and on the same day, the chapel of the Virgin, which stands immediately behind the neglected chief altar, is blazing with lights and thronged with devotees of all classes and sexes, though chiefly females; and if you take your stand for a time by the marble screen which encircles the high altar, you will see that the entire tide of congregation, ladies of the highest fashion as well as the humblest contadina, including such men as enter the church—all, almost [without exception, pass by the principal service, even as it is going on, and join the more popular assemblage on the other side. Such facts as these, as well as a thousand other similar indications of the direction in which all religious feeling sets, are daily before the eye, and are as undeniable as the deductions which may be legitimately drawn from them.

PRIESTLY CORRUPTION.

What one hears of priestly corruption, and above all of priestly extortion, in this country is of such a character, that nothing short of the minutest investigation and strictest analysis of each story would justify its reproduction. But both the origin and the variety of the information received on this head are sufficient to produce a strong conviction in one's own mind of the truth of much that is asserted. That the whole body of the Italian clergy are, as allowed to me by one of themselves, trained up in systematic opposition and hostility to the existing order of things, to the Government and national will, is what none of them probably would consider to be a crime, or even a fault. That it is entirely true of them, I believe to be the case, with died at Rome ; so that the Examiner must mend its instance, and—if one could hope so—reform its vindictive theology. What are Hindoos, Zoroastrians, &c., to think of Christianity, when they see its name used to harbour the dreariest dogmas of priestly impiety ?

TURKEY.

TRANSLATION OF THE KORAN INTO TURKISH.

The Turkish Government has just taken a step in respect to the Koran which must be regarded as of the highest importance. It is well known that the Koran was originally written in Arabic. Its style is so beautiful, so far above the spoken Arabic of the present day, that this fact has been adduced as a proof of its inspiration. It has been preserved in manuscript, and all good Mussulmans have agreed that it would be a sacrilege either to translate or to print it. As to translation, the very words and letters were regarded as sacred in themselves. To translate them would be to destroy their value. The words were the words of God. Shall any mortal venture to change the words of God, and substitute human words in their place ? As most of the Turks cannot understand the Arabic, they have no knowledge whatever of the contents of the Koran. Yet they read the Koran constantly, and no small part of the education of a Turkish child consists in committing to memory passages of the meaning of which they know as little as if they were in English. These are regarded as charms. The meaning has nothing to do with their value. They are not only committed to memory, but are written upon paper, and worn upon the person or affixed to the walls of the house.

During the cholera season of the present year I noticed that such a paper was nailed over every door of the palace of Aali Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs. Kiamil Pasha's palace, next to that of Aali Pasha, had a different set of charms over the doors, and in this palace there were several deaths of cholera. After these had occurred the charms were taken down, and new ones put up, similar to those used by Aali Pasha. The Koran is also used to heal the sick. During the cholera I saw an imaum reading over a poor Turk, and at the end of every sentence he blew in the sick man's face, apparently blowing the words on to him. Passages of the Koran were also chanted in the streets at night to drive off the evil spirits, who were supposed to be sowing the seeds of the cholera over the city. A translation of the Koran could have no such value, and therefore would be as useless as it would be sacrilegious. The religious faith of Mohammedans really rests not upon the Koran, but upon the received commentaries and traditions, which are far below the Koran in every respect. The Koran has been translated into Turkish, but this translation was regarded as an infamous act, and it never came into use. As to printing the Koran, it is said, "Who can dare to put the sacred words of God into a press and squeeze them ?" "Shall the words of the Most High be put on a level with the blasphemies of infidels ?" "The book as it came from God and the Prophet was written, and so it must always be."

The American missionaries have actually been advised by Turks of the new school (who are really infidels, and no more Christians than they are Mussulmans) to translate the Koran into common Turkish, and print it for circulation, as a sure means of destroying its sanctity in the eyes of the people. What they declined to do, the Imperial Government has now done officially. By order of the highest authorities, the Koran has been translated into Turkish, and has just been issued from the Government printing establishment. An elegant copy has been formally presented to the Sultan, and the public are now invited to purchase it.

It is a strange and unaccountable step. I understand that Ethem Pasha, who ordered the execution of the work, was questioned about it the other day, and replied that its translation had become a necessity. The Protestants had begun to circulate the Bible among the people in their own language, and as a means of self-defence, they could do nothing less than give the people the Koran. We can ask nothing better than this. Let the people have the Koran. Let them read it side by side with the Bible. Let them compare the two and judge between them. It will not require great learning or skill to decide which is the Word of God speaking to the soul, and which is the work of man.

I regard this step of the Turkish Government as one of the most important it has ever taken. I believe it will be resisted by the Ulema, who will endeavour to hold the people to the original and incomprehensible Arabic ; but every inquiring mind will inevitably turn to the translation, and learn from it that the Mohammedanism of to-day is still in prison and fetters. We anti-n's letter of July 13, together with eived at the same time from his com-captivity, does not appear to contain elligence of later date than that sent ssam from Egypt, and commented on er in the Times of September 14. I given to understand that these letters ght to Massowah by the messengers who conveyed to Mr. Rassam the King's invitation to Gondar, by the way of Matamma; and that the reason why they have only now reached England is, that instead of coming direct from Massowah to Suez, they went round by the way of Aden.

Assuming this to be the case, it may appear strange that Mr. Rassam should have transmitted from Suez the telegram, "Consul Cameron is released," which appeared in all the newspapers on the 6th of September. But the explanation is this: Mr. Rassam having made it a condition that the liberation of Consul Cameron should precede his delivery of the Queen of England's letter to King Theodore, the latter ordered the Consul's chains to be removed in the presence of Mr. Rassam's messengers, and then had them replaced by heavier fetters as soon as the messengers were out of sight. They were, however, thus enabled to report what they had actually seen.

Mr. Stern's explicit statement of the condition of himself and his fellow-prisoners, which is confirmed by Consul Cameron himself, must of course be accepted as true, in preference to the reports of native messengers, or Foreign-office telegrams.

At the same time, it is only natural that the account given by the captives of occurrences outside their prison walls should not always be correct. For instance, Mr. Stern states that the King had "written" to Mr. Rassam to come to Abyssinia. This may be what the prisoners were told, but I have reason to know that the King refused to send any written reply to the letters brought by Mr. Rassam's messengers; and the Pall Mall Gazette, which is understood to possess special means of obtaining correct news about Abyssinia, says, in its impression of the 2nd inst., "It is stated on reliable information that the letter from Theodoros inviting Mr.
 Rassam to Gondar did not bear the Royal signature."

It is, therefore, on an unsigned missive from King Theodore, sent through the persons who reported to Mr. Rassam that Consul Cameron had been released from his chains, that the Queen of England's envoy is proceeding to Gondar by way of Matamma with Her Majesty's letter. Persons who are competent to form a judgment on the subject say that the King's real object in desiring Mr. Rassam to take that road is that he may get him into his power and make him a State prisoner, as Mr. Steiger (whose letter I referred to in the Times of September 14) says Consul Cameron and the other Europeans are, "until the political differences between England and the King of Abyssinia come to a satisfactory conclusion."

Be this as it may, Mr. Rassam will, on reaching Matamma, have to report his arrival and obtain a safe conduct, without which (it is said) he will not cross the Abyssinian frontier. How long he may have to remain there in consequence is matter for conjecture, but it is to be feared that the period of the release of the unfortunate captives is still very remote.

I have just heard that the Galla prisoners at Magdala alluded to by Mr. Stern were executed by being hurled down the precipitous sides of the Amba, or hill fort, after having first had their hands and feet cut off.

AMERICA.

New York, September 12, 1865.

THE AMERICAN CHURCHES IN RELATION TO SLAVERY—THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The topic which the religious press of America is now discussing with the greatest interest, is the probabilities of the reconstruction of those large ecclesiastical bodies which have been divided by slavery or the war. The walls being broken down, men look for the separated parties to come together. But the restoration, in some cases, at least, cannot be very speedy. Those churches, especially, which years ago discussed the question of slavery with warmth enough to make it the occasion of a schism, will not readily forget the earnest and protracted strife; while those which evaded that question and deferred ecclesiastical separation until it became a necessary consequence of the attempted secession, may find but little difficulty in effecting a speedy reunion.

Upon this ground, it is probable that the Episcopal Church will be united again sooner than any other. It did not separate until the war had begun. The matter of slavery has as far as possible been passed by in all ecclesiastical debates and resolutions. The rebellion itself, which other religious bodies have so freely discussed and characterised, has elicited from their conventions no exasperating comments; and thus there is but little on record that can prevent the divided parts from coming together. Indeed, the diocese of Texas has already formally repealed the resolution by which in 1862 it identified itself with the Episcopal Church of the Confederate States, and has renewed its relations to the General Convention of the United States. Bishop Elliot, the presiding bishop of that church in the Confederate States, has issued a letter, in which he criticises indeed the prompt and summary way in which the diocese of Texas has transferred itself into its former relations, and requires that a joint committee of the two conventions decide upon the conditions of reunion. It is a matter of no great consequence, perhaps, whether this salve to sore feeling be withheld or granted. The restoration is near at hand and easy.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

The relations of the divided parts of the Presbyterian Church are not to be described so briefly. As long ago as 1857 the Southern part of the New School Church separated from the General Assembly, and for what was called the United Synod. A difference of views on the subject of slavery the occasion of the separation. The School Assembly, on the other hand, maintained its jurisdiction over its South churches until the beginning of the rebellion. After that event the Old School church in the South formed themselves into independent body, taking the name of "General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America." This "Assembly" the "United Synod" afterwards connected itself; that, at this time, the Old and New School churches of the South are united in one organization. There is little probability that organization will be speedily dissolved. A very obvious question would embarrass an attempt: With which of the two North Assemblies shall the composite South Assembly coalesce? But another is considerable than this. The ground of both of the Northern Assemblies have to do concerning slavery and the attempted secession, is one upon which the South churches claim they cannot meet them out a surrender of their self-respect, and of their sincerest convictions. Before war, indeed, the Old School body was more guarded in its utterances concerning slavery than the New School. But after rebellion broke out, the more conservative body, as if to revenge itself upon the one that had so long constrained it to an irksome silence, withheld no expression of its repudiation, both of the rebellion and of slave power. The New School Assembly was outspoken, of course. The recollection of these "delinquencies" will not hasten the restoration of its sundered ties. But the most substantial obstacle to reunion is that to which I refer in a former letter—namely, that action of the two Assemblies by which, without compromise, indeed, and in different terms, they have pronounced those Southern ministers who advocated the cause of the Confederacy to be guilty of treason, and required them to make penitent confession of that sin before they can be admitted into any presbytery. One can hardly help feeling that there is more than a show of justice in the response which Southern ministers make to this demand, namely, that they acted according to the official creed in which they had been educated and sincerely believing that their States were sovereign, it was, at the worst, only treason fore men, and not treason before God, that they should attempt to withdraw those States from the Federal authority; and that, however necessary the Government might find it to punish the political treason to which such an error has led, it cannot become an ecclesiastical body to reason back from that political and conventional treason to the motive out of which it grew, and to punish the error for a wilful crime. At least, they claim they acted in good conscience, and can never confess that they did not. The Assemblies may find reason for relaxing something of the stringency of the resolutions in question. If they do not, it is not easy to see why ministers only shall be condemned and punished for a sin which so many church members have committed with them. For it would seem that a loyal session has as much need for suspending a traitorous member from the communion, as a loyal presbytery can have for excluding a traitorous minister from its roll.

If the Assemblies shall ever find reason to admit that their action in this direction has been extreme, it may prove to be no ultimate disadvantage that they have taken it. For the present, this greatest injury, as it is regarded, is attracting the attention of all the Southern churches. If, by-and-by, a candid concession can remove this obstacle, a vast amount of ill feeling may go with it. Like a scapegoat which is near and tangible, it may be concentrating the old prejudices upon itself, in order to remove them all at once.

THE METHODISTS.

It is about twenty years since the Methodist Episcopal Church was divided by the organization of what is called "The Methodist Episcopal Church, South." And it is probable that this breach, which has lasted the longest, will be the slowest to heal. Such of the organs of the Southern Church as have been revived give evidence of the same intense feeling for slavery which at first divided the denomination. It is hard to see what conditions of reconciliation can be offered by either side, while the difference of sentiment is so radical and so pronounced.

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION—A DYING TESTIMONY.

The summer has brought but little of interesting incident in the religious world. The most noticeable recent event, perhaps, has been the National Temperance Convention at Saratoga. It was largely attended by influential men. The combined enthusiasm and prudence of their deliberation and action give hope of a new impetus to that most important and languishing cause.

Our papers have recently contained a very striking recital of the dying utterances of a most respectable public man, Governor Brough, of Ohio. After having been not a little startled by the announcement that he could not live more than forty-eight hours, he became composed, and, in the presence of his family and a near friend, described the life of prayer which he had lived, and expressed his penitent trust in the sole merit and grace of Jesus Christ. Then, after exclaiming that he saw his Redeemer at the right hand of God, he soon lost consciousness and passed away. He was a man of great executive ability, and very popular in his state and in the nation. His unequivocal testimony for Christ cannot fail to do good.

New York, October 10, 1865.

A "CHRISTIAN COMMISSION" FOR THE MASSES.

The close of the war put an end to the work of the Christian Commission. But the Christian zeal which prompted and sustained that work, and the valuable experience which was gained in it, of course survive; and since there are multitudes of men in our cities and all over the country who are entirely unevangelised, it has seemed desirable to some of the most earnest members and friends of the late organization to have it replaced by another which might deserve to be called a "Christian Commission for the Masses." Accordingly, a convention has already been held (in Cleveland, Ohio, September 27), to consider the propriety of establishing such a society. Nearly three hundred delegates were present, representing every considerable denomination and many smaller ones. The body included some of the foremost clergymen and laymen in the nation. Chief Justice Chase, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and lately Secretary of the Treasury, presided over the convention, and introduced and furthered its work by hearty and impressive addresses.

The name of another lay member of the body has recently become very familiar to us in America, and must have reached at least financial circles in Europe—that of Mr. Jay Cooke, of Philadelphia, who has been the chief agent of the Government in the rapid disposition of its immense loans. It is pleasant to know that he enlists his characteristic zeal and ability in behalf of every as not a fair representative of his class. And yet, up to that time, he had been rated kind of apostle among them. It is probable now that the other apostles will have an opportunity to vindicate their more solid aims. Meanwhile, the subjects of this mischievous delusion may consider with profit the sensible words of Judge Hall: "Our reason, as well as our instinct, teaches us that our departed friends could communicate with us, and give information and advice for the regulation of our conduct, they would not refuse to exercise this power because we decline to contribute to fill the pockets of some strolling performer, or have failed to address them through the brokerage of some professed spiritual medium."

AN INTERESTING EXPEDITION.

A characteristic chapter of American history is told in our recent journals. Six years ago, a Mr. Mercer, born in Illinois, and graduated from a college in Ohio, went to Washington Territory, on the Pacific. On his arrival, having no money, he set to work as a labourer, in digging the foundation of a building for a new university of some sort. By the time the building was completed, he had made headway enough to be chosen president of the institution. How well he discharged the duties of that office, and whether he holds it still, I do not know. But his zeal for the welfare of that distant community has set him upon a new undertaking, in which only a man of character could hope to succeed. He sailed from this port, on Saturday last, on board a steamship provided by the Government, with a company of nearly a thousand persons, chiefly from New England, a few of them in families, but most of them young women. There are three hundred orphan daughters of soldiers among them. Some of his company pay the small expense of their voyage in advance. But many only engage to repay him out of the first rewards of their labour, for every form of which there is such demand in the distant territory, that Mr. Mercer does not expect to be out of his money long. His chief aim, of course, is to carry refinement and piety to a community of men. They are to sail round the Cape, a voyage of from sixty to eighty days. Smooth seas and kind winds for them, thither and thereafter!

THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The American Board of Missions, now holding its annual session in Chicago, has ended its financial year out of debt. It proposed a year ago to raise about 600,000 dollars. At first the receipt fell far short of this standard. So lately as August 1 there remained 100,000 dollars to be collected. But, according to their custom, the officers of the Board issued their appeal; the hearts of their constituents responded; and before the first of September the whole sums came together like the moisture of dew which the sun gathers into a cloud. The exact amount needed and raised has been 534,763 dollars. This, indeed, leaves a small balance in the treasury.

PROSPECTS OF THE NEGRO.

The topics that chiefly engage the public mind in this country cannot be dwelt upon in this letter. I might speak of the deportment and future prospects of the freedmen, but under the conflict of interested statements upon both sides, it is not safe to speak with definiteness or confidence. Many are doing well; many are doing ill. The first class are practically self-dependent already. The others have untold wretchedness before them. And if it is possible that large numbers whom the Government cannot reach, even by the best system of help, may even perish in their improvidence.

The question of negro suffrage, which is so much debated among us, cannot possibly come to a speedy solution. The complications which grow out of the incompetence of many of the freedmen on the one hand, and on the other out of the prerogative of State Governments that are little disposed to grant the franchise to a race so long despised, cannot be disentangled by human skill. The tendency, however, to undo all political distinctions that are based upon colour, is too strong to be finally resisted. All moderate and good men consent that many of the negroes ought to be voters now. It is the vice, as many think it, of absolutely universal suffrage, which, forbidding a discrimination in favour of such negroes as ought to vote, almost compels a discrimination against them all. Perhaps when the cure of this wrong to the negro comes, it may involve the cure of some other wrongs, and exclude from the polls brutish ignorance of every colour.

The policy of the Government in the speedy reconstruction of the State Governments, and the pardon of the leading advocates and agents of the late rebellion, is regarded by many with great solicitude. Of the re-establishment of slavery, indeed, there seems to be little danger; and yet until three-fourths of the States shall have confirmed the constitutional amendment which excludes it from the ciples of religious liberty. Turkey and in, not to mention other lands, have led to the pressure. The doors of geons, Mohammedan and Papal, have been thrown open; first to admit the con- tions of the Gospel, and finally to let the ives go free. These results, however, gh important, were only the fruits of the , not the root. They associated to realise unity and to promote the cordial union he children of God. Recognising the fact these are to be found in every country, in every pure Christian denomination, recognised the duty of promoting herly love and union amongst them. ce it followed that if any brother was a erer for the truth's sake, whatever his try or church, he was the object of their al sympathy and help. Such operations ally resulted from their profession of y in Christ. In their early days the nbers of the Alliance were frequently ted or catechised by the so-called "prac- l" men. They were told that love was ery good thing, but were asked in the e breath, "What are you going to do?" e question was thought so pertinent, so incible, that the questioners often didn't t for the answer. Sometimes this taunt k the form of caricature. They were morously represented as meeting just say, "I love you very much," and then arating to meet again with da capo. He ln't know whether the retort to this was ogether conclusive: that even if they did ore than that, it was worth doing; but showed their predominant purpose. About enty years had elapsed since their first con- ence in Liverpool in 1845, and how stand ters now? It seemed pertinent to inquire ither their main purpose advanced as well the work of a subordinate or collateral id. He thought the question "What are u going to do?" had been very triumphantly wered. Facts had been accomplished in equence of the union which, humanly aking, would not have been otherwise omplished, and which twenty years ago uld have been, perhaps, esteemed the wild eams of an excited imagination. In re- ect of these the Alliance might, with per- t modesty, say, "Quorum pars magna fui." vertheless, he was not quite satisfied that e prosecution of their primary purpose had en equally successful, at least in the itish Islands. Meanwhile their principles d purposes remained the same. What ought about the Liverpool Conference in 45? Those who were present would well remember the deep and solemn conviction felt and expressed that Disunion was sin. They would also remember the earnest search- ings after means and grounds of union, and the severe, perhaps morbid, jealousy for truth and conscience, lest these should be sacrificed on the altar of love. Would not they remember the burst of holy joy when grounds for possible union were discovered and announced? Never since had they had a meeting quite like that for the unction, power, and fire of love. Possibly some of the charm lay in the novelty of the expe- rience, and that good men possessed of this religion were to be found in every church and denomination. Theoretically this was, of course, no new discovery; but practically it had long been ignored or not realised. Away, then, with everything that builds up walls of separation, that necessitates disunion; away, at all events, with that which chills and represses catholic, brotherly love. Such was the general sentiment at Liverpool in 1845. They felt that the real union of Christ's Church ought to be manifested, and that to effect this, scarcely any sacrifice could be too costly, or any effort too great. The pertinent question for them seemed to be, not what were they going to do, but what was the present condition of their prime purpose of Christian union? Were churches or denominations becoming more or less selfishly sectarian, more or less generously catholic, &c.? After considering this point at some length, the reverend doctor observed that the question still cropped up, whether something of more direct and visible catholic effort could not now be attempted than has yet been attained to. He besought their especial attention to this remark: Is it possible to get the branches of the Church visible, or at least many of them, to confer together in one, and to act unitedly for the promotion of objects in which they are all agreed? If this proved practicable, as he ventured to hope it might, would not such united action be more powerful by far than that of individuals united in the Alliance? And must not such a catholic manifestation of visible fellowship directly promote their main object, and tend to the further experience and diffusion of Christian love? Might not also the Alliance be well the centre of such catholic united effort? He threw out this suggestion with diffidence, yet not without hope. He was indeed aware that whatever degree of visible union was attained, it would be "rather the effect than the fruit of love." Still, the effect was worthy of the cause, and he desired to but also claims to be the judge of the true sense of interpretation of the Scriptures. Now we have reason to believe that no church has received from Christ power to decide on questions of doctrine so as to bind the consciences of its members. The universal Church had not authority, and if so, much less had any local church. The reverend gentleman referred to passages quoted in support of the doctrine of church authority, and pointed out that they failed to establish the point in favour of which they were so quoted. The National Churches of England, Scotland, or Russia, could not have authority, because they differed from each other, and none had more distinct authority than the other. 2. The effects of the doctrine that the Church has authority have been most disastrous. He referred to the ignorance of the Scriptures amongst Romanists which prevailed, in consequence of this doctrine being carried out, and the persecutions to which it had led. Very few Roman Catholic commentaries are now written, because, perhaps, authors are afraid to write, lest they should prove to be in opposition to the authorised exposition. But few copies of the Word of God are found in Roman Catholic countries—even in France, Italy, and Belgium—where there is the greatest liberty of thought. The doctrine also prevents Roman Catholics from owning the truth when they have discovered it, because they would have to encounter excommunication. It also leads to a collision between churches, and how can a church that has promulgated an error afterwards correct it? Its worst effect is that it places the Church of Christ in subjection to the world. 3. The speaker then remarked on the effects of the true doctrine. The most important truths are the plainest. Authority must be sought in the study of the Word of God, and in free discussion, under a sense of our responsibility to God. The authority of the Scriptures being established, all Christians must submit to it. The criticisms of good men may, indeed, throw light upon the Word of God, and in a wholesome collision between truth and error, truth may be always advancing. On the whole, the progress of religious unity must proceed exactly as it does in politics and in science, by unceasing discussion, in which mistakes and blunders of all sorts come to light, to be exploded by a sound exposition of the Word of God. The address was listened to with the deepest interest.

The meeting was then adjourned, and the company assembled shortly afterwards at the Public Rooms, where dinner was provided. The Mayor presided. The company, which numbered about 150, included a number of ladies. In accordance with the custom of the Alliance, only one toast was proposed—that of “The Queen and the rest of the Royal Family,” which was duly honoured. The company then engaged in discussion on topics connected with the suggestion made by Dr. Blackwood in his opening address; various hints being thrown out for prosecuting still further the primary object for which the Alliance had been established.

In the evening sermons were preached in connexion with the Conference at several places of worship in the town.

DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES.

The Rev. Robert Balgarnie, of Scarborough, presided. A hymn having been sung, the chairman read a portion of the 4th chapter of Malachi, and then addressed a few words of exhortation to the meeting. The Rev. R. Taylor, of Bristol, Lord Radstock, the Rev. James Smith, of Wisbeach, the Rev. E. Jukes, of Hull, the Rev. George Scott, of Newcastle, and the chairman, offered prayer.

ANNUAL REPORT.

Lord Benholme then took the chair, and the Conference business was proceeded with.

The Rev. J. Davis read an abstract of the annual report. It was particularly encouraging. It stated that, notwithstanding the peculiar difficulties encountered, arising from many causes, the Alliance had shown during the year a large increase of new members. Exclusive of those persons who have joined the Alliance through the various provincial and foreign organizations, 120 had been received by the Committee in London since the last Conference, of whom 28 were ministers of different Evangelical denominations, including ten clergymen of the Church of England. The report referred to the large correspondence which had taken place with brethren both in the United Kingdom and in foreign lands. This fraternal correspondence had greatly strengthened the bands of Christian union, and made its value felt among many nations, and in some cases had resulted in substantial help being rendered for the promotion of God's work. The week of united prayer, at the commencement of this year, had been observed in all lands, and there was reason to believe that much good had been accomplished. The report mentioned one instance in India, where the meetings had been considerably protracted, and had resulted in the hopeful conversion of 150 or 200 individuals. The special prayer for the children of Christian parents, on Wednesday, April 5th, had been held both at home and abroad, and the invitation would be repeated. At the meeting in London, 1,200 parents were present. The report then proceeded to notice several instances in which the influence of the Alliance had been brought to bear in favour of religious liberty. Particular mention was made of the recent violation of religious liberty in Constantinople, in direct opposition to the Hatti Humayoun, published by the Sultan in 1856. It was a matter for much congratulation that the efforts of the Alliance's committee in Constantinople, strengthened by the action of the English Government, had restored in a large degree the religious rights and privileges previously enjoyed. The next case was that of a Swiss, whose house had been entered, and his five children carried away, because he declined having his infant child baptized. The children were subsequently restored to their parents. A letter was afterwards received from a gentleman connected with the Swiss Government, thanking the Council, in the name of the Alliance, for the prompt and successful action taken in this case. After noticing other cases in Germany, the south of Russia, and in the Tigris, the report stated there were further cases in which the Council had taken such steps as in their judgment were most likely to obtain redress for their persecuted brethren. The Foreign Secretary had proceeded to Holland to confer with the Dutch committee on the subject of the general conference to be held there next year. At the last conference in Edinburgh, a desire was strongly expressed that some way might be discovered to the admission of members of the Society of Friends into the Evangelical Alliance, at the same time maintaining the basis in its integrity. The subject had been referred to a sub-committee for their consideration, and the Council awaited their report before advising further steps in the matter.

J. Finch, Esq. (Treasurer), read the financial statement, which showed that there had been received 1,948*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, and expended 1,602*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* With outstanding liabilities, there was a balance of 32*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* against the Alliance.

On the motion of the Rev. H. S. Warleigh, seconded by the Rev. J. Gostick, the report was adopted.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD.

The Rev. T. D. H. Battersby, M.A. incumbent of St. John's, Keswick, next delivered an address on "The Privileges Believers, and the Need of a Stronger Effort to Obtain Mightier Results for the Church and the World." We give the concluding part of the reverend gentleman's address: I expect more and we shall get more. Let us consider more our great privileges and commands, the commands of our Master, the Lord of our brethren; and let us besiege the land of grace more constantly and believingly on behalf of ourselves and them. Only if that object were gained for which the Evangelical Alliance was established, believers in Christ were not only one instead of disunited, as now, but also thorough in earnest and alive in the use of their gifts and endowments, what would surely be the issue? Then would that be literally fulfilled (as old Matthew Henry observes) which Job of old said of the Babel builders, when they were so united and earnest, "And the Lord said, Behold the people are one, and have all one language, and this they began to do; and now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do." (Gen. xi. 6.) God grant this consummation indeed! Towards this let us all strive up to this let us work. But let us remember what our Lord further said to his disciples, "This kind goeth not out by prayer and fasting." If we understand great schemes, and are ambitious not only to "save ourselves," but to make successful inroads upon Satan's kingdom without, we can only be by much self-discipline, acquiescing in secret before God. Thus have good men of the past—thus may they and do they succeed in "pulling down strongholds;" like St. Paul, they have been enabled to "Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh known the savour of his gospel by us in every place. It is a sad thing to look upon a gross world, now that eighteen and a-half centuries have passed since Christ came, and to find that there are such powers lying dormant, which, if used as they might and ought to be, would tend, in a great measure at least even now, "to the healing of the nations. To think that there are such abundant means of blessing and salvation in the world, yet that there are so many unblest and unsaved!

At the conclusion of this address Mr. Urwick was called upon to offer prayer.

BROAD AND THE NARROW CHURCH IN ALL DENOMINATIONS.

The Rev. Dr. McCosh, Professor in Queen's College, Belfast, read an address on this subject. Speaking first of the Broad Church, he said it was to be found in Ireland as well as in England. As yet there is not much of it in Ireland, although, with influence exercised by a centralising London press, and the intercourse between the three kingdoms, it will no doubt spread largely in the sister island. He was aware that the Broad Church was specially striving to promote a union between Evangelical Churches. In this respect it is a narrow church. It has no sympathy with less refined but more zealous bodies. Its avowed aim is to blunt the sharpness of some of the doctrines and precepts proclaimed in the churches of the three kingdoms. As to the Bible, it is always hesitating, often doubtful. It would receive only so much as is sanctioned by reason. It does allot a high value to certain truths of Scripture; it acknowledges the deity of Jesus Christ, though sometimes grounds the doctrine on doubtful philosophical speculations rather than on the Word of God. But, on the other hand, it seeks to lower and modify the doctrine of atonement. It scarcely sees the need of atonement. It would not do away with Sabbath, but it would lessen some of its obligations, and deprive it of some of its solemnity. Its system does not require self-denial or sacrifice. It would endeavour so to set up religion as to remove the "offence of the Cross," but the attempt is a void one. Posed to the Broad Church is the Narrow Church. These two repel each other. The chief fault of the Narrow Church is that of being incapable of comprehending the full value of Jesus Christ. This fault may have arisen from its partisans having had no liberal education, or from their narrowness of intellect. They may be excused, however, until they became censorious of others who take wider views. But these narrow views spring up generally from a culpable selfishness of heart, which will not allow itself to be enlarged by the full influence of Christian love. He would say a word or two on a point which specially concerns this age. Once must be allowed to prosecute its own course—the discovery of the laws of nature. Man can discover nothing but truth. Some of the truths of science may appear to be opposed to the Scriptures, but it may turn out that we have misinterpreted the words or the facts. Besides this, there are times when one part of true science cannot be reconciled with another, as with Galileo and the Church of Rome. That man is narrow-minded who considers his denomination as comprising the Church of God. He is narrow-minded when he refuses to see anything good in any other denomination but his own. There is a narrow-mindedness which has favourite doctrines, and pays no regard to any others. There were some, too, who neglected the "graces" of the Bible, and others who affected to despise "muscular Christianity." He did not like the latter term, but he thought it was a proper object to have a sound mind in a sound body. The Rev. Professor then quoted some remarks of Mr. J. S. Mill, M.P., on the teaching of the Bible, and exposed the fallacy of the charges brought against the Holy Scriptures by that well-known philosopher. In conclusion, he said they must hold fast by the old truths which have been handed down to them. They were not likely to gain an enemy by giving up any portion of the truth. If they gave up one portion, they would have eventually to give up all that was supernatural in the atonement.

THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

At seven o'clock the Conference met in the Public Rooms, Jarratt-street. The large hall was densely crowded. This session was devoted to the following subjects:—

1. The Progress of the Work of God in Foreign Lands.
2. The Fifth General Conference of Christians of all Nations to be held in Holland next year.
3. Religious Liberty in Foreign Countries, and recent action taken in its defence.

The chair was occupied by Colonel Holden, of Nottingham. A portion of a hymn was sung, after which the Rev. T. D. H. Battersby offered prayer.

Pastor Casalis, of Paris, who represented Pastor Monod, who was to have been present, was first called upon. He conveyed the salutations of his brethren in France. He could not speak much of what they had done, for the last year had been one of inward struggles. The enemy had crept in amongst them in the garb of what is called "the new school," and that had prevented them from doing as much as they could wish for the ex-only 4,000 or 5,000 Baptists in Sweden. The people were formerly not allowed to meet for prayer and reading the Word of God. When the revival came the people would not give up these exercises; they were punished, but again held their devotional meetings, and by-and-by the restrictive law was abolished. The Evangelical Society of Sweden had been at work for eight years. It had distributed 3,800,000 Bibles, books, and tracts. The population was about 4,000,000, so that each person might have got one. They had also sent books abroad—some had been sent to M. Revel for distribution in Italy. A great interest was felt in the progress of Italy, and funds were being collected for a mission to Sicily. Colporteurs were also employed, and in one instance a minister sent for a colporteur to assist him in his parish. But there are many against this work, and indeed they must fight without laying down their arms while in this far-away country, where darkness rules the people, until they reached the limits of the kingdom of light. The reverend pastor remarked that in Sweden parents were compelled to send their children to school: hence most people could read and write; and the Bible is not spread in any country more than it is in Sweden, and in each parish libraries are provided, from which the peasants borrow books. He then described the operations of the City Mission in Stockholm. Great gratitude is felt towards England for more than a million of Bibles which had been sent from this country. When he left Stockholm he was told at a prayer-meeting of the City Mission to bring their kindest regards to all Christians in England that he should meet with. He rejoiced at the opportunity of meeting once more his English friends, and in conclusion he exhorted them to keep united until they had spread over the earth their Saviour's name.

The Hon. J. W. Van Loon, of Amsterdam, was next called upon. He said he came as a deputy from the committee in Holland, to invite as many as could get to the meeting there next year, and to give them beforehand some idea of the condition and character of the country he invited them to visit. It had often struck Dutchmen as surprising that in England Holland was so little known. If they looked at their maps they would find how near the two countries were to each other. They were near also in their religious belief, and on one great occasion, when England was threatened with a powerful armada, Holland united to help her. Since that time a Prince of Holland had been instrumental in securing to England its religious and political liberties. Further, he would say, look at their hearts, and see how near they were to each other. But it was not all pleasant tidings that he had to bring. Where God sows good seed, Satan sows his tares. In Holland there are several denominations, but if any one was to go to any of the churches he would find only one great difference, and that would prevail in all denominations. In each case there was one half light and one half dark. M. Casalis had spoken of the "new school." It was called the "modern school," but it did not deserve the name. It meant atheism, and atheism was not theology. It was something negative, taking away the foundation of everything we have got, and giving nothing for it. They often, indeed, speak of God the Father and God the Saviour. There is a Missionary Society—the oldest in Holland—which has for its motto, "Peace through the blood of the cross." That motto is stamped on every book it issues; but they have openly repudiated it, and other missionary societies have been founded to counteract its influence. There are ministers, too, who preach of God the Father, but eliminate the Son. Some of them deny entirely the Godhead of Christ, or the Holy Ghost. In this condition of things, they greatly needed an outpouring of the Holy Ghost over the country. They wanted help from on high, but also help and sympathy from their brethren of other countries. Therefore it was with great pleasure that he brought the invitation for the next general conference to be held in his country. There were many who thought at first that it would not be so desirable or agreeable, but at last they have taken a deep interest in the matter, and they see that it will be highly beneficial to them. In Holland the cities are not, as in England, divided into parishes, but every one goes to the church he likes, and the different pastors preach alternately in the different churches, the places where the pastors preach being announced. Those who preach bad doctrine, however, get the smallest audiences; and an earnest, though not talented, pastor will draw a larger audience than an eloquent one who preaches bad doctrine. This shows that there is a great hunger after the Word of God. The speaker then remarked on the peculiar position which Holland occupied. German neology invaded it on the one side, and French atheism entered it on the other. In conclusion, he hoped that his English brethren would come to the general Conference next year in great numbers, and that

The second resolution, moved by the Rev. Dr. Wylie, seconded by Mr. J. Finch, and supported by the Revs. Wm. Harris, and Dr. Bliss, Dr. Stewart, Pastor Scheltena, Mr. T. Sercombe, Rev. Dr. Schmettau, and the Chairman, was as follows :—

That the warmest thanks of the Conference be presented to the Christian friends in Hull for the excellent arrangements which they have made for the holding of the meetings of the Conference, and the entertainment of visitors attending it, and especially to the numerous Christian friends resident in Hull and its neighbourhood who have opened their houses for the reception of visitors, and for the cordial and Christian hospitality which has been afforded them. The Conference, in expressing its gratitude to the friends in Hull, would record its prayers that they may reap a rich reward in the blessings which social intercourse and the meetings of the Conference may be the means of bestowing.

The following resolution of sympathy with their Vice-President, John Henderson, Esq., in his continued indisposition, was moved by the Rev. Dr. Blackwood, and seconded by the Rev. Dr. Steane :—

The Conference would not willingly separate without expressing, in humble submission to the will of our Heavenly Father, the sincere regret of the brethren assembled here at the continued indisposition of our beloved Vice-President, John Henderson, Esq., of Park, which prevents his appearing amongst us. Knowing our dear friend's deep and warm interest in the cause, and the delight he always took in these assemblies, they desire to convey to him the expression of their affectionate sympathy ; and at the same time to gladden his heart with the intelligence that by the favour of God they have enjoyed in Hull a delightful and profitable season of intercourse ; and that they trust through divine grace solid spiritual blessings shall accrue to this locality from the present visit of the Evangelical Alliance.

The concluding resolution, moved by the Rev. T. Curme, and seconded by the Rev. James Scholes, of Bridlington, expressed fervent gratitude to God for His favour, graciously vouchsafed to the meetings, and commending the Alliance to all sincere Christians, as fitted to be a blessing to the universal Church.

The company then adjourned to the Royal Institution, where a devotional meeting was held. The Rev. James Grose, of Hull, presided. A hymn was sung, the Rev. James Turner, Vicar of Deddington, read the Scriptures, and the Rev. William Watson, Langholm, Rev. James Gostick, Hull, Thomas Wilson, Esq., Waterford, and the Rev. Andrew Jukes, Hull, offered prayer.

APPOINTMENT OF COUNCIL.

At twelve o'clock the Conference business was resumed. Dr. Sandwith presided. The committee nominated for the purpose brought up the list of names for the Council for the ensuing year.

The Rev. Professor Brown, of Aberdeen, proposed, and Major Van Heythuysen seconded the appointment, which was carried.

THE DISSEMINATION OF EVANGELICAL TRUTH AMONG THE MASSES OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord Radstock delivered an address dwelling on the subject so far as it related to individual action. He would not attempt to lay statistics before them, but he would venture to say what had been the characteristic of the conversion of souls during the last few years—viz., that it had not been any particular form of effect, nor any particular set of individuals, nor any special gift, but that the whole of the members of the body of Christ, in proportion as they awakened to a sense of their privileges, are being used in a marvellous way in the work of winning souls for whom Christ died. He noticed several cases in which individuals had been specially useful. In one case an officer in the army was brought to a knowledge of Christ, and evinced a desire to be in some way a labourer in God's vineyard. But he could not find any way, as he thought, of making himself useful. At last it was pointed out to him what might be done in reading to the poor and ignorant ; and in this way, without any "machinery" or special effort, he made himself an extremely useful servant of God, and effected much good amongst those who would not have been reached at all, but by personal visitation. The most ordinary capacity is equal to a work of this kind, no special talent is required, and the humblest and least gifted of the servants of Christ may in this way do much to extend the Saviour's kingdom on earth.

Robert Baxter, Esq., followed on the same subject as relating to the operation of societies. He first, however, mentioned two or three remarkable instances in support of Lord Radstock's remarks. In one case a master chimney-sweeper named William Carter, in the south of London, had brought several hundred individuals. He had drawn people round him by inviting them to tea. On one occasion he invited the chimney-sweeps of his locality ; at other times he invited the cabmen and destitute ; and one time he sent out cards of invitation to the thieves, the cards bearing the notice, "No honest man admitted." One of his (the speaker's) French friends had remarked on this, "What a chance for the police." The speaker then selves in the work of love. In some cases it may be attended with benefit; but in the long run it brings serious dangers. It induces self-exaltation and spiritual pride. It is the duty of every Christian to engage in some portion of the labours of the Church; and in proportion as he shrinks from bringing himself into unhealthy prominence is his zeal likely to be healthy and useful. God resisteth the proud even in works of grace and benevolence, but He giveth grace to the humble. It was the duty of every church to conduct its labours in a spirit of charity, forbearance, and kindly appreciation towards other churches. We must not make the grand mistake of taking the part for the whole. If we do, we commit an error which brings a certain reaction upon ourselves.

The Rev. James Davis, Secretary, read a letter from the Rev. Arthur Burtis, D.D., of Buffalo, New York, delegate for the American and Foreign Christian Union. It expressed the profound regret of the writer that he had been compelled to relinquish his intention of meeting the members of the Evangelical Alliance at Hull, and of tendering to them in person the Christian salutations of their friends in the United States. Especially he desired to express the sympathy of the American and Foreign Christian Union with the principles and efforts of the Alliance.

The Rev. Eustace Conder, of Leeds, spoke of the Alliance as an organization for the manifestation and promotion of union among Christians. Such an association would have been unintelligible to the first Christians; they would have said, "We are one, by one spirit baptized into one body." The calamitous divisions of the Christian Church furnish both scope and need for such an organization. Mr. Conder then referred to the divinely-ordained connexion between life and organization, pointing out the analogy between the organisms, ever decaying and dying, ever renewed, through which the succession of vegetable and animal life is maintained, and organized associations of men for common objects, commercial, scientific, political, or religious. Christianity, as a new life, necessarily produced organizations, and these organizations or churches were as necessarily frail and decaying. Church history was the record of the attempt to withstand this great law, and establish an organization comprehensive of all Christian life among mankind, alike universal and durable, and of the prevalence of the law against this effort. The idea of "catholicity" presented in Church history, and at present so earnestly advocated in our own country, was a sublime idea—perhaps sublimer than any other except the true spiritual idea of the Church of Christ—but it was essentially a human idea. Could it have triumphed, had as our divisions are, there might have been a unity worse than division. If it was asked, Why have a new organization for the purpose of Christian union, since, if Christian churches are a success, it appears needless; if a failure, hopeless? we answer, We expect that the Alliance will fail as they have failed, and succeed as they have succeeded; that it will fail of fully realising its idea, but that it will succeed to a degree amply worth working for. The time may come when it will grow old and lethargic, like other organizations, swathed in red tape, and limiting its ambition to the production of the report and the appeal for funds; but this will not be in our time, nor, unhappily, is the need for the Alliance likely to cease in our time. Let us, therefore, while it is young, and vigorous, and able to work, put all the energy into it, and get all the work out of it that we can.

The Rev. J. Gostick expressed the delight and edification he had felt in attending the meetings of the Conference, and the various services connected with it. In return for the thanks which had been so warmly tendered to the friends of Christian union in Hull, he felt that they had been greatly honoured by the presence amongst them of so many Christian strangers—some of them, for many years, well known by their names and works, though not in person—and richly and abundantly rewarded by the interest of their communications, and the never-to-be-forgotten influences from above that had rested on them.

Pastor Beskow, of Stockholm, next made some remarks, in the course of which he mentioned the circumstances under which the revival in Sweden, that he had mentioned on the previous evening, was brought about. The Rev. George Scott, Wesleyan minister, was the instrument, thirty years ago, of commencing that revival, and he only mentioned this as Mr. Scott was not now present. In conclusion, the reverend pastor said he was going to do what he did not like to do, he was going to take leave of them. When he got home there would be many ears listening to what he should have to tell them of his British brethren. He hoped the meeting would allow him to take back the Christian regards which he had conveyed from home.

about to be built in a small town or thinly-populated district, where two schools cannot be maintained, the managers of the school shall, before they receive a grant, insert in the trust-deed a declaration that the children of Dissenters may receive secular instruction in the school, and that they shall not be bound to attend the religious instruction against the will of their parents. This is called the "Conscience Clause," and is vehemently objected to by High Churchmen. As was to be expected, Archdeacon Denison was loud in his opposition. He insisted that, under the guise of studying the consciences of Dissenters, this was really an attack on the consciences of Churchmen, and he gave no fewer than seventeen reasons for rejecting the plan.

There were few speakers to controvert the Archdeacon. Canon Norris, an old inspector, stood up for the principle at least of a Conscience Clause; and another inspector, Archdeacon Allen, was prepared to do so too; but when the Rev. Mr. Caparn, of Draycott, read a correspondence which he had with the Committee of Council, in which he was told that under the Conscience Clause a teacher must not, against the will of a parent, teach a child the Creed, or explain doctrinally any passage of Scripture, the Archdeacon gave up the case, and admitted that the clause could not be defended—an admission which was hailed with great applause by the friends of Archdeacon Denison.

The Final Court of Appeal in Ecclesiastical Matters was the subject of several elaborate papers, in which the origin of an Appeal Court, and its working, were minutely traced from ante-Reformation times down to the present day, by Sir Robert Phillimore, the Queen's Advocate, Archdeacon Randall, and others. Neither these papers, however, nor the discussion which followed, admit of compression, and their scope may easily be summed up; for while all, or nearly all, condemned the court as it at present exists, no one was agreed on that which they would put in its place. One objection taken to the mode of procedure in the present court, which was first made by Sir Willoughby Jones, met with very general acquiescence. He adverted to the course taken in the case of the "Essays and Reviews," in which the prosecutors were rigidly tied down to prove the charge of heresy out of the sentences of the book which they had libelled, and were not allowed to refer, either in explanation or in corroboration, to other passages; while the accused were at liberty to cite passages out of any other portion of the book to explain away the effect of the passage libelled. He thought the same liberty ought to be granted on each side, and in that opinion the whole Congress appeared to concur.

An interesting paper on the duties of the Church to the home population was prepared by Dr. Hook, the Dean of Chichester; and though the dean was not able to be present, it was read to the meeting by his son, a minor canon in Chichester Cathedral. He stated that though the parochial system worked well in the country, it was nearly defunct in the large towns; and in the back lanes and alleys of those towns there were still large masses of population who were as much outlaws as the classes that in the middle ages haunted the caves and woods. To carry to such persons the Word of Life, there must be missionaries, and the parochial system must not be permitted to stand in the way. His plan for the large towns was the following:—

We might permit the people full liberty of attending whichever churches they pleased, and under the bishop of a diocese might be appointed an archdeacon, with full power to send missionaries into those dark alleys where the Saviour's name was only heard to be blasphemed. Such an archdeacon—whose archdeaconry ought to be well endowed—might be appointed for every town having a population of 30,000, and a rural dean with similar functions might be appointed for a smaller town. For these offices we ought to select clergymen who had served in a large parish or in a Peel district for ten years. By these means an incidental advantage would be secured—the prospects of an archdeaconry would induce many to devote themselves to town work who now applied themselves to country work. A well-educated ministry would also be secured for our merchants and manufacturers; these were sometimes University men devoted to scientific pursuits, and, although there were some distinguished exceptions to the rule, the tendency of scientific and even literary pursuits was to induce men to call in question the great principles of our holy religion. To provide such persons with a learned clergy was one of the wants of the age. Of course this could not be done without a large accession to the present amount of labour, and he was in favour of lay help, though he was averse to lay organization, as he dreaded it would take the form of a clique.

The Rev. J. B. M'Caul also read a paper, in which he dwelt on the amount of spiritual destitution in England, and said it was a startling fact that there were now more persons habitually absent from Divine worship than existed in England at the time of the Reformation. He deprecated the clergy taking upon themselves the duties of sanitary commissioners, athletes, popular lecturers, &c. The laity ought to take up these questions,

The Bishop of St. Andrew's read a paper on Foreign Churches, in which he insisted that in dealing with the Churches of Rome and the East the English Church ought not to admit that she was responsible for the schism that existed. As to the Continental churches, he was for communion with them only so far as they were one with the Church of England upon Christian doctrine and Christian ministry. This led to a smart passage at arms between the bishop and Mr. O'Malley, the Recorder of Norwich, who observed—

In the name of a large body of the clergy and laity of the Church of England, he protested against the doctrine that a question of Episcopal ministry or non-Episcopal ministry was to separate Christians who acknowledge a common Lord, when he found it written in the Word of God that the hand of fellowship should be held out to all who "love the Lord Jesus Christ, and wait for his appearing." (Cheers.) With reference to the association represented by Mr. Lee [for a union of the Greek, Latin, and Anglican Churches], he observed that as that association was composed only of members of the Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Greek churches, it could mean nothing unless it meant that persons who did not belong to one of those churches were not entitled to be considered as Christians. ("No, no.") It must either mean that such persons were not entitled to be looked upon as part of Christendom, or that they were to be technically regarded as schismatic members of one of those churches, or else that in an appeal to God for unity their prayers were not worth being invited. Against any one of these propositions he entirely protested, and he believed the Church of England and its Articles protested against any such doctrine.

The bishop replied, and took refuge in the assumption of superior theological knowledge, but Mr. O'Malley adhered to his protest.

Other discussions took place on the preaching adapted to the present times (on which the Dean of Canterbury and the Rev. D. Moore read papers), on the position of the Church in Ireland, the utilisation of cathedrals, the income of the episcopate, missions to the heathen, church music, &c.

Simultaneously with the sessions of the Congress, several smaller meetings for special ecclesiastical objects were held in Norwich. The most important of these was the "Free Church Conference"—having no connexion with the religious denomination which bears that name, but composed of members of the Church of England desirous of converting all her places of worship into "free" or "open" churches—in other words, of abolishing the pew-rent system. The most remarkable feature in this Conference was a speech in favour of its object by the Rev. Dr. Pusey, who warmly advocated the bringing of the Gospel of Christ home to the poor, and added that this occupied a much higher place in his thoughts than rites and practices with which his name was popularly associated, but for which he himself cared very little.

ENGLISH UNITED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD.

The English Synod of the United Presbyterian Church held its annual session on the 9th ult. and three following days. The Rev. James Pringle, of Newcastle, was unanimously chosen Moderator. Mr. Pringle is the oldest presbyter in the denomination, and the day on which he occupied the Moderator's chair for the first time, he entered on the sixty-second year of his ministry. Among the various matters which came under consideration, two occupied the largest share of attention. One of these was the relation of the Synod to other Nonconformist bodies, which gave rise to an animated debate, introduced by the Rev. Mr. Leitch, of Wigton, who proposed resolutions of a restrictive character, pointing to the bringing of other bodies of Christians to agreement with the views of Divine truth entertained by the Presbyterian Church as the object to be aimed at in all intercourse with them. The Rev. Dr. Cairns proposed and carried a resolution which simply declared that the principles on which intercourse with other bodies was conducted were well understood; and thus the resolutions of Mr. Leitch fell to the ground. The other matter was the proposed union between the English Presbyterian Church and the United Presbyterian Church. After this subject had been considered with closed doors, a resolution was adopted to the effect that while the proposed union was very desirable, and all prudent means should be used to effect it, no such separation from the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland as the English Presbyterian Church desired could be entertained as a preliminary to the union. It was resolved that the next meeting of the Synod should be held in Manchester, and that the Rev. Dr. M'Kerrow should be the Moderator.

THE BAPTIST UNION.

The autumnal meeting of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland was held at Bradford during the second week in October. The Rev. Dr. Angus, President of Regent's-park College, occupied the chair, and the meeting was attended by many of the most distinguished men of the Baptist denomination, among whom were the Revs. W. Brock and C. H. Spurgeon. There were present at the session upwards of 400 brethren, lay and ministerial, from all parts of the kingdom. The chairman delivered an able and elaborate address, which was subsequently described as a vindication, evangelically, of the Baptist denomination. The Rev. N. Haycroft read a paper on "Our Colleges," in which was advocated the importance of a higher standard of education for students. A memorial, prepared by Moritz Geissler, pastor, was presented, at the request of the Baptists in Saxony, with regard to alleged persecutions and sufferings inflicted by the Lutheran clergy, not only because they met for separate worship, but especially on account of their refusing to take their children to the Lutheran font. A resolution of sympathy with suffering brethren in Saxony was adopted, and also a memorial to the King of Saxony on the subject. It was stated, in the course of the discussion, that as the Evangelical Alliance of this country had stepped forward once and again in behalf of the poor down-trodden brethren in certain parts of Germany, the Alliance would be communicated with. The Rev. D. Gould suggested that Her Majesty the Queen be also memorialised to use her personal influence with her cousin, the Duke of Mecklenburg, who, he said, was one of the bitterest persecutors of the Baptists on the Continent. The Rev. W. Walters stated that it was alleged as a reason why the Baptists on the Continent were persecuted, that they were an altogether different body from their brethren in this country—more of a political party. A report was presented from the Education Committee on the subject of the better education of the children of ministers. The Rev. J. Mursell, of Kettering, read a paper on "Our Associations." He showed that the disintegration of Baptist churches was a source of weakness, and that association was a great power for usefulness. He also showed that the Baptist churches in the metropolis especially were in a state of isolation, and said that Sir Morton Peto's generous proposal as to chapel-building would not have been allowed ignominiously to fail if there had been a compact and well-worked metropolitan association. This, the second autumnal meeting of the Baptist Union, is regarded as having been completely successful.

NEW FORM OF PRAYER.

One of the last official acts of the late

Lord Palmerston was, in compliance with the suggestion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to give the necessary instructions for the issue of a form of prayer for the removal of the cattle plague. For that purpose, a Cabinet Minister went down to Balmoral, and at the Council there held by Her Majesty the requisite order was adopted, by authority of which the subjoined appropriate and scriptural petition has been brought into use in the National Churches throughout England and Wales:—

O Lord God Almighty, whose are the cattle on a thousand hills, and in whose hand is the breath of every living thing, look down, we pray Thee, in compassion upon us, Thy servants, whom Thou hast visited with a grievous murrain among our herds and flocks. We acknowledge our transgressions, which worthily deserve Thy chastisement, and our sin is ever before us; and in humble penitence we come to seek Thy aid. In the midst of judgment, do Thou, O Lord, remember mercy—stay, we pray Thee, this plague by Thy word of power, and save that provision which Thou hast in Thy goodness granted for our sustenance. Defend us, also, gracious Lord, from the pestilence with which many foreign lands have been smitten; keep it, we beseech Thee, far away from our borders, and shield our homes from its ravages; so shall we ever offer unto Thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, for these Thy acts of providence over us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE LATE CANON STOWELL.

Last month we recorded the loss which the cause of Evangelical religion had sustained in the death of the Rev. Mr. Oakley, of Covent-garden. It is with deep regret we have to mention that his death has been quickly followed by that of the Rev. Canon Hugh Stowell, of Chester Cathedral, whose name was known and respected wherever Evangelical religion prevailed. He had been in ill health for some time previous, and for two days was unconscious, though he revived a little before his death. No hope of recovery had been entertained for a considerable period before his decease. He passed away without suffering, and at the latest moment seemed to articulate the word "Amen." From a local paper we extract the following summary of his life:—

The Rev. Hugh Stowell, M.A., Canon of Chester, Rural Dean, Chaplain to the Bishop of Manchester, and Rector of Christ Church, Salford, was born in December, 1799, at the parsonage of Douglas, in the Isle of Man. His father was for many years Rector of the parish of Ballaugh, near that town. After passing through the usual course of preparatory studies, the subject of the present notice matriculated as a commoner at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1818, took his degree of B.A. in 1822, and his master's degree in 1826. Not long afterwards he was ordained to the ministry by the late Bishop Ryder. His title for orders was the assistant curacy of an outlying chapelry of the parish of Sheepscot, Painswick, Gloucestershire. In the following spring he removed to Huddersfield, in which busy manufacturing town he accepted the curacy of Trinity Church. In this sphere of duty he remained for a period of about two years, when he accepted, in 1825, the sole charge of St. Stephen's Church, Salford. Here he became so popular as a preacher, and so highly esteemed as a devoted and laborious pastor, that in the fear of losing him among the many pressing invitations which he received to undertake other and (in a pecuniary sense) more valuable spheres of action, a number of his parishioners and other admirers subscribed a handsome sum of money, and built for him Christ Church, Salford, of which he became the first incumbent, and which preferment he held until his death. The church and the schools attached to it have cost upwards of 15,000*l.*, the whole of which sum was voluntarily contributed by his flock. Christ Church, Salford, was erected and opened in 1831, and is remarkable as having been the first church which was erected under the then recent act of Parliament, the Trustees Church Building Act, which, for the encouragement of persons willing to build churches, gave the right of nomination in perpetuity to those erecting them, and their successors. In 1845 Mr. Stowell was nominated by the late Archbishop of Canterbury (then Bishop of Chester) to an honorary canonry in the cathedral church of Chester. In 1851, shortly after the erection of Manchester into an episcopal see, the Bishop of Manchester appointed Canon Stowell one of his Lordship's chaplains, and subsequently rural dean of Salford. Among his best known works are "Tractarianism Tested," "Model for Men of Business," "The Pleasures of Religion, and other Poems," "The Peaceful Valley," "A Visitation Sermon," "An Ordination Sermon," "An Assize Sermon," several "Sermons for the Church Missionary Society," and a great number of single sermons, lectures, speeches, and letters, mostly on such subjects of theological controversy as have arisen from time to time.

It is almost superfluous to add that Mr. Stowell was a firm and constant supporter of the various Evangelical societies which have been established in connexion with the Church of England, such as the Church Missionary Society, the Bible Society, the Pastoral-Aid Society, the Colonial Church Society, and others of a kindred spirit.

DEATH OF THE REV. JOHN CLAYTON.

The Dissenters have also lost an eminent member of their body in the person of the Rev. George Clayton, who died at Bath, on October 3, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. Mr. Clayton, for many years pastor of the Poultry Chapel, London, was son of the Rev. John Clayton, of the King's Weigh-house Chapel, and brother to the Rev. George Clayton, of Walworth, all celebrated men in their day, and much beloved and respected. He was educated at Homerton College, and entered the ministry in 1801. For nearly a century their names have been before the public as connected with the cause of Evangelical Nonconformity. The late deceased was of a remarkably generous disposition; his hand was ever open to every good cause, and his hospitality was unbounded. When a boy, he, with his brother George, received the blessing of John Wesley, who placed his hands on their heads and repeated Jacob's blessing. Mr. Clayton was insensible for some time before his death, but at the last moment he awoke in bed, and said to his attendant, "I am going. Now let us give thanks to God for His goodness;" then sank gently down upon his pillow, and died. "He was," as a writer in the Patriot, "a true Christian gentleman, a faithful pastor, and, in his day, a popular preacher, though his popularity was based on entirely different qualities to those which in this day draw great crowds. He was not a great orator, nor was his oration profound. His sermons were digested and carefully prepared; his manner was deliberate and grave, his matter solid and weighty; and he built up a church of a trustworthy, and useful Christians."

SUNDAY TRAVELLING IN SCOTLAND.

For eighteen years the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway directors have closed their line on the Lord's-day. Lately, however, the line has been transferred to the North British Company, the directors of which have always had Sunday trains on their line. As soon as the amalgamation was complete, Mr. Hodgson, the chairman of the combined lines, commenced a Sunday train morning and evening. Great opposition has been offered in both towns, especially in Glasgow, where the people, as well as the Presbyteries, have remonstrated with the railway authorities, but hitherto their remonstrances have proved in vain. Mr. Hodgson insists, in spite of evidence afforded him to the contrary, that public convenience demands the opening of the line, and that the public feeling is in its favour; and as the other directors appear to share his views, it is to be feared that the North British shareholders, who have been so apathetic in the matter in regard to their own lines, will not feel their consciences burdened by this fresh addition to the Sunday trains.

Monthly Survey of Missions.

INDIA.

The introduction of the Gospel into Cashmere is greatly opposed both by the native rulers and the people. No European is allowed to remain in that country throughout the year; but it has been visited, for several summers, by the Church missionaries. When their object became known, it was with difficulty, and at some personal peril, that one of them, on entering the capital, obtained shelter in a house which he had bought and paid for; it was, in fact, threatened with destruction by a fanatical mob. In the summer of last year the first convert—Mohammed Hussan—was baptized. While yet an inquirer he was not only cast off by his family, but twice imprisoned by the Cashmere Government—on the second occasion thrown into a dungeon, treated like a murderer, and so heavily fettered, that he was unable to rise from the ground for three days. He remained steadfast, however, and was released by the interference of the British agent. Another young Mohammedan, who heard the Gospel last year for the first time, became so interested, that he accompanied the missionary part of the way on his homeward journey. He was pursued, however, and overtaken. Then—

The soldiers violently beat him, and having pinioned his hands behind him, led him off to prison. On being brought into the principal court, he was asked if he had accompanied the missionary party of his own free will. His answer was in the affirmative; and he further stated that he had gone to hear about the Christian religion. He was then sent back to prison, and four days afterwards he was sentenced to be publicly whipped. This shameful treatment accordingly took place, in the presence of a great crowd of witnesses. Meanwhile, news was forwarded to Jummoo, and an order was sent back from the chief Government that he should be imprisoned for three months. He was therefore put in chains, and kept confined until the term was expired. His two brothers, then, at the order of Government, pledged themselves, in writing, to employ every means in their power to prevent his going in future to the missionaries. The man, however, is evidently in earnest, and has gone to them, in the face of the bitterest persecution.

Meal for making bread was refused by the Maharajah's official at the bazaar to the native servants who accompanied the missionary, so soon as it was known that they were Christians, and could not, therefore, be obtained in the capital, but only in the adjacent villages. Prejudice has been somewhat disarmed, however, and the work of Christian instruction facilitated, by the commencement, during the past summer, of a medical mission by Dr. Elmslie. The doctor's dispensary, where he daily conducts Christian worship, has been resorted to by not a few natives, and he has sometimes had as many as forty patients in one day, who were thus brought under the sound of the Gospel.

From Travancore, the Rev. H. Baker, an experienced Church missionary, writes that in one district under his charge—that of Pallam—he has in two years baptized nearly 450 converts from Chogans, Palaries, and Pariahs, with five Nairs (a wealthy, military caste). In another district—Mundakayam—during the same period, seventy Arrians (a wild hill-tribe) have been baptized from heathenism, and about the same number of slaves. One outstation is entirely Arrian, and had driven out those families who adhered to the mission: now they have called them back, and placed some of themselves under Christian teaching.

A missionary, who is retiring from the work at Nellore, in the retrospect of ten years' continuous labour, writes:—

Our work as a mission has been mostly giving the Gospel to the people in their own tongue, by the distribution of God's Word, and in long tours for preaching the truth. We feel this work is not simply a prospective one, the results of which are in the distance. God has given us abundant evidence of His willingness to bless His Word to the conviction, if not conversion, of many souls, and the kingdom of darkness, at its very foundation, is, we feel sure, trembling, and must crumble soon. Caste is losing its hold on the minds of the people; a people is being prepared to serve the Lord. I am fully aware that the land is full of idols, idolatry and awful sins; yet we feel the time is near when the joy of the harvest will be shouted home, and these arid plains, covered by millions, will yet blossom with the plants of God's own planting. The work of continuous itinerating has been prosecuted for the last two years with the most cheering results. Thousands of men and women have heard the Gospel, and hundreds of villages have been visited by witnesses for Christ. We are looking for the Spirit's power to cause the good seed to spring up and bring forth an abundant harvest. The mission church (native) has increased about thirty since my arrival in India. Several have died in the triumph of faith, leaving the brightest evidence to the power of Divine grace to carry the soul through the dark waters to the happy land. The church has also appointed from its members its pastor and deacons, so that now foreign aid might be dispensed with, except so far as the infant church, the members of which were once dark idolaters, requires the kind oversight of the missionary. The average contribution to the support of the Gospel year, by the church of, really, the poor, has been about seventy rupees. This fact has cheered much. Then the church has been a truly evangelising one; the male members, most of the time and strength allowed, going into the streets and telling the story of the Cross; the female members, in a more quiet way, visiting the houses of the heathen to carry the Gospel message to their dark-minded and degraded sisters. God, in His mercy, has on three special occasions in ten years poured out His Spirit on the mission, reviving the church, and converting souls. In months since the entire boarding-school was most powerfully wrought upon, and it was my privilege to baptize five new-born souls.

CHINA.

Reinforcements are greatly needed by the various Chinese missions. The work in Canton in connexion with the Wesleyans languishes, in consequence of the mission having been reduced from six to two. The Baptists were lately contemplating the abandonment of their field of labour in China. All the missions, whether British or American, are tried by the want of men or means. The work in Amoy, however, continues to prosper. During the six months last reported, there was an addition of thirty-three members to native churches associated with the London mission, which gives a total of more than Chinese Christians in connexion with the several societies labouring there.

New ground has been broken by the Rev. G. Smith, of the English Presbyterian mission at the town Kway-T-ham, three days' journey from Swatow. Mr. Smith describes that place as a stronghold of Romanism, adding, that it is fearful to contemplate the vast array of agencies which the Church of Rome has at work all over China. "Their success," he goes on to say, "is also very great. It is one of the most formidable facts with which Protestant missions have to grapple. The self-denial, patience, energy, laboriousness of Romish missionaries fitted to make one blush. . . . A few missionaries, settled down, mostly with families in the treaty ports, are no match for men who live and labour among the native population all throughout the interior." Mr. Smith's preaching at Kway-T-ham at first excited opposition; but this afterwards subsided, and a favourable impression appears to have been made upon some portion of the population.

Eleven persons were baptized in the American Episcopal Church at Shanghai on Easter-day. "It was," we are told, "an affecting sight. There was the grey-headed man devoted the eleventh hour of his life to the Lord's service, side by side with the babe, whose parents like Hannah of old, have determined to 'lend' their first and only child to the Lord; the also, was the mother with her little son, like Christiana and her children, starting together on the pilgrim's journey, whither her husband, like Christian, has gone before."

We regret to state that Dr. James Henderson, of the London Mission at Shanghai, breathed his last on the 30th of July, at Nagasaki, in Japan, whither he had gone for recovery of his health.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The war between the Orange Free State and the Basutos, which broke out a few months since, has been attended with the most disastrous consequences to the Free Protestant mission. Not only has it effaced all religious impressions from the minds of many of the natives, but it has rekindled in their breasts the dormant instincts of the savages and Boers who have fallen into the hands of Basutos have been massacred without mercy. Several of the stations have been burned by the Free State Boers, but their president, Brand, it is only just to say, gave express and repeated orders that the missionaries and their personal property should be respected. At the date of the last advices, Mosheah, a Basuto chief, had sued for peace. M. Casalis, Director of the French Protestant Society's Mission-house, has recently visited London, and had an interview with Her Majesty's Principal Secretary for the Colonies. He has urged the desirableness of bringing about reconciliation, based upon equitable arrangements, between the belligerents, through the intervention of the Government at the Cape. "The thing will not be easy," says M. Casalis, "after all the injury which the Basutos and the Boers have done each other. But we are nevertheless persuaded that it may really be done."

Although the mission was not without its difficulties previous to the breaking out of the war, yet it was undoubtedly, upon the whole, in a prosperous condition. The statistics for last year lie before us, and give indubitable evidence of most cheering progress. The aggregate number of hearers in the Basuto congregations was, on ordinary occasions, never less than about 2,800, and sometimes amounted to nearly 4,000. The communicants numbered nearly 1,700. The number baptized during the year was ninety-two; and ates for baptism were upwards of 500. Now, we regret to say, in the words of a iary upon the spot, the work "seems to be ruined."

 he German mission to the Basutos has also been threatened with extinction. The per-n which it had long endured from the chief Sekukuni became most cruel and severe e secret baptism of one of his wives. This act was the result of peculiar circumstances, gers having been previously despatched by the missionary to advise her waiting, but unfortunately missed her. Sekukuni immediately took measures to extinguish the ith among his followers. He deprived all who had any connexion with the white s of their corn, and forbade them to gather their crops or use the water springs.
 led to the mountains. Those that remained (some few of high rank excepted) were ifully scourged; one convert, after he had thus suffered, being apparently lifeless. The aries and their faithful flock found themselves compelled to seek safety in flight.
 were arranged, and finally a body of forty adults, with twenty-nine children, crossed er and went southward in search of a new location. This was found on the Upper le, where in the spring of this year the missionaries were engaged in establishing a an colony. Disturbances in other districts have since scattered others of the converts.

The heathen are kind and affectionate to the missionaries, and Moselekatse, now
 g old, has, with his soldiers and people, listened attentively to the preaching of the F. Thomas, of the London Society. "No former visit of mine to the chief of the been commenced.

MADAGASCAR.

he Rev. W. Ellis returned from Madagascar last month, and met the directors of the n Missionary Society, by whom he was very warmly welcomed. He gave a most en-ing account of the spread of Christianity among the people of Antananarivo. The apers speak of a disturbance in the capital on account of the payment of the indemy the French Government, and allege that cries had been raised under the windows of een's palace for the expulsion of the French consul and of the Roman Catholic mis-Whatever truth there may be in this report, Mr. Ellis was understood to express his in the stability of the present Government.

The treaty between our own Government and that of Madagascar, which, as we stated onth, has been ratified, more than satisfies the expectation of Mr. Ellis, in so it relates to the native Christians. Civil and religious freedom is secured by explicit ions both to them and the missionaries. The difficulty as to the ownership of the sites memorial churches has been got over thus: There is no absolute transfer, and the affirms the proprietorship of the soil by the sovereign; but by a supplementary article ereign is bound to appropriate these churches exclusively to the teaching and worship missionaries and their converts and to their successors for ever. The prospects of the n are now deemed more assuring. "Although some members of the Government may favourable to foreigners or to their religion, yet," writes one of the missionaries, tianity is spreading far and wide, and the seed scattered in the days of persecution is ringing up and bearing fruit in places where one would least of all have expected it."

WEST INDIES.

About twenty-five years since the Church Missionary Society felt itself compelled, on al grounds, to relinquish its missions in Jamaica. The society has just received from three of the congregations formerly connected with it their first annual contribution funds, amounting to 80%, subscribed almost wholly by black and coloured people.
 s an instance of the spirit in which the money was given, as narrated by the Jamaica man in whose parish the greatest portion was raised:—

ie man, a black man, whose face I had not seen for two years, and whose very existence I

measures 370 tons ; is 130 feet long, with 25 feet width of beam, and 15 feet depth of hold. She is built of the best materials, and was pronounced by Lloyds' surveyor to be "everything that the society could wish or expect." The model is perfect, and the fittings are of the most simple yet most elegant description. The ship is intended for the operations of the society in the South Sea Islands, and will be commanded by Captain Williams, who was commander of her predecessor, after which the ship is named, and which was wrecked on Danger Island last year.

The contributions of the poor inhabitants of Savage Island (population 5,000) to the London Missionary Society for general objects and the new ship amount, this year, to 324*l.* Towards this sum the children alone raised nearly 10,000*lbs.* of cocoa-nut fibre. Liberal subscriptions have also been forwarded from other islands. The May meetings, at which these contributions were brought in, were celebrated, as usual, with much interest and warmth of feeling.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

THE inhabitants of Paris have been much agitated by the outbreak of cholera among them. It had raged for some time and with great severity at the Mediterranean port of Marseilles ; and then, passing over, with a few exceptions, the intermediate towns, it settled down upon the capital, where the victims have been numerous, and the excitement all the greater as no official return of the seizures or the deaths has been published. In this emergency the Emperor and the Empress have both endeared themselves to the Parisian community by making separate visits to the cholera hospitals, personally inspecting the arrangements made for the relief of the sufferers, and cheering them by kind inquiries into their condition. As it appears that the origin of this mysterious disease can, on the present occasion, be traced to the crowding together of the Mussulman pilgrims at the port of Jedda, the Emperor has suggested a conference of representatives from the different European Powers, to endeavour to prevent, if possible, such a concourse generating the same plague in future. The English Government has already signified its concurrence in the proposal, and it is believed that the Sultan also will lend his aid. As may be supposed, the outbreak of cholera has led to an outbreak of fanaticism, and miracles are again raising their heads in the country districts. For an interesting account of one of these we must refer to the letter of our correspondent. It will gratify the friends of truth to learn that Dr. de Félice, long one of the Professors, has been appointed Dean of the Protestant College of Montauban.

The question whether the French troops will really leave Rome at the end of the stipulated two years is discussed with feverish agitation all over Italy. The hopes of the Italians have been lately raised by an order that a portion of the troops are already to return, and that the remainder are to be concentrated on three points of the Roman territory ; but even this first step finds hostile interpreters, who say that the strategic points which the French have now taken up will never be abandoned by them, but that, on one pretext or another, excuse will be found for them to stay. All this, of course, shows the interest which the question excites in the Italian kingdom. It is certain that the Pope is making no preparation for his own defence when they are gone. There was a talk some time since of the Pope's army being re-organised and increased, but that idea has been given up, mainly on account, it is said, of the poverty of the Papal treasury. The elections to the Italian Parliament are now nearly completed ; and the reports that were at one time so rife of the Church party having a majority are proved to be entirely unfounded : few candidates offered themselves in that interest, and still fewer were elected. In the meantime, the work of suppressing the monasteries goes on with great rapidity. About fourteen of them have been shut up in the course of the last few weeks, and their revenues placed at the disposal of the Government. Some of the ejected bishops have been allowed to return to their dioceses, on the promise that they would not give trouble to the Government. The preaching of the Gospel is still continued, and the Bible is widely circulated ; though in those localities where the priests retain their influence, obstacles are thrown in the way of both. Such localities continue to be too numerous for the welfare of the Italians themselves. Nothing can be more distressing than the accounts published, from time to time, of the superstition of King had laid a trap for Mr. Rassam, who was proceeding to mediate on their behalf. We understand, however, that Dr. Beke is still willing to proceed on his errand of mercy to endeavour to effect their deliverance, at whatever hazard to his own person, if the funds are raised by the public.

HOME.

England has sustained a heavy loss. Her most experienced statesman—the most versant in her affairs, the most devoted of her servants—who has borne a leading part in her councils for the last half century, and who brought that ripe experience, that varied ability, and that passionate love of country to the direction of her policy, which he has guided, with an insignificant interval, for the last eleven years—has, at last, been removed from our midst. The life, as well as the public career, of Lord Palmerston was prolonged far beyond the ordinary limit of mortality; yet so exuberant of vitality was he, so full of elastic energy, so lightly did the load at once of years and of government rest on his shoulders, that his death comes upon the country with something like a shock. Though he was within two days of completing his eighty-first year, yet, when he was last seen in public, there was still so much of his old vigour and airy grace, that we might well believe he had strength enough to meet, and to guide, at least, the opening deliberations of the Parliament that had been called together under his auspices, and so many of whose members obtained their seats by the simple profession of confidence in his wisdom and patriotism. It has seemed otherwise to the Great Disposer of events. That Parliament must now meet under other leaders, and, it may be, will adopt counsels he would never have advised. But this is not the time to indulge in these speculations. Our thoughts are filled with the contemplation of the great Minister who so lately moved among us; whose person, whose movements, whose terse, spirited, and lively addresses were so familiar to us all; and who had so identified himself with the feelings and temper of his countrymen, that every Englishman was accustomed to think and speak of him with affectionate familiarity, as if he were a personal friend. It is only now, when we see the great gap his loss has made in our political and social life, that we can comprehend how large a space he filled while amongst us—it is only by the disputes aroused concerning his successor that we understand how unreservedly the nation trusted to his experience. It is not for us to speak of his religious character. Frank and out-spoken as he was on every public question, he was singularly reticent on all matters of personal feeling; and his sense of the relations that subsisted between himself and his Maker was the very last that he was likely to obtrude upon the public gaze. But the undisputed purity of his administrative career may well be supposed to have sprung from purity of internal principle; and in his ecclesiastical appointments he has the praise—as Dr. Pusey lately pointed out—of being the first Minister who systematically made them on religious grounds. But whatever his personal convictions may have been on these matters, we believe that Christians of all parties will agree that his great accomplishments, his wide and varied experience, his dauntless spirit, and his unselfish patriotism, were gifts which are only conferred upon a country when, as Cowper expresses it, “Heaven means mercy to a land.”

Within a few days of the death of Lord Palmerston, Her Majesty called on Earl Russell to take his place. This appointment, it is understood, has been acquiesced in by all the colleagues of the noble lord, who took an early opportunity of signifying their willingness to serve under him with the same loyalty which they observed towards his predecessor. Some changes, of course, were inevitable. Among the most important, we may mention that the Earl of Clarendon has become Foreign Secretary, and that Mr. Gladstone, retaining his old post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, will be the new leader of the House of Commons.

The examination of persons arrested on the charge of Fenianism has been continued during the past month. Little that is new has been elicited, however; the evidence against one is the evidence against another; and the charges are made with wearisome monotony. The wicked and mischievous designs of the leaders, however, appear to be fully established. Archbishop Cullen has published a pastoral on this subject, which is in many respects a curious document. For the Fenians themselves he has no mercy, as might be expected from a Romish ecclesiastic, who finds that his order and his religion are as hateful in the eyes of the conspirators as Protestantism; but he contrives to insinuate, at the same time, that if rebellion were ever justifiable, the Irish people would be justified in rebelling. He repeats all the old and now unfounded tales of Roman Catholics being treated with injustice, and shut out from public employment, and hints that Irishmen never to be satisfied till they secure tenant-right. But what seems most especially to stir his gall is the honours that were paid to Garibaldi on his visit to England. Not the time that has elapsed, nor the eventful changes that have taken place since the feast has obliterated the indignation with which Dr. Cullen saw this "prince of revolution" feasted by the nobles and ecclesiastical dignitaries of Protestant England. In his eyes was a great national sin, which was enough to bring down upon the land the judgment of Fenianism.

In grateful contrast with Dr. Cullen's pastoral, we note the charge to his clerical brother, Archbishop Trench. The Archbishop lays claim to the credit of having been born and bred an Irishman, and on that ground, among other and higher ones, he identifies himself with the fortunes and prosperity of the Church he has been called to govern. On the question of national education, which our readers are aware has never been accepted by the clergy of the Irish Establishment, his Grace proposes a compromise. Adverting to the fact that throughout a large portion of the Irish schools the education is already denominational, and not mixed—there being, even under the National Board, hundreds of schools where there is not a single Protestant, and hundreds more where there is not a single Roman Catholic, though all are hampered with restrictions on the religious teaching, in their case is quite needless—the Archbishop proposes that in all these cases the education should be given in accordance with the tenets of the respective churches, and that in districts where the population is unable to support two schools should the present restrictive regulations be preserved. This, it will be seen, differs very little from the operation of the "Conscience Clause" in the English system of education. But we must not forget that Dr. Trench, in his laudable anxiety for a settlement of this question, has overlooked the aversion of the people of England towards the endowment of purely Roman Catholic schools. The Archbishop laments that there are so many parishes in Ireland without glebe-houses for the residence of the clergymen, and considers, no doubt with justice, that this is a hindrance to the spread of Protestant doctrine. We wish his Grace would turn his attention to a more important defect in the Irish Establishment—the absence of any provision for the settlement of the Celtic-speaking population should be able to preach in their own language. Had this been done at the time of the Reformation, Ireland would, in all probability, now present a different religious aspect. Is it now too late to repair the error?

The Archbishop of York has also delivered a charge to the clergy of his diocese. Here, for him, he has not to deal with the thorny questions that his brother of Dublin is called to discuss. He congratulates his clergy on the additional provision for their endowment that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have recently been able to make, which, in connection with the abounding liberality of private persons, he regards as a proof that, in the midst of the conflict regarding doctrine, the vital power of Christianity has in no degree weakened its hold on the population. His Grace adverts to the Court of Final Appeal, and while saying that no scheme of amendment that he has yet seen recommends itself wholly to his judgment, he adds that, in fact, the only real and effective tribunal is the concurrence of the clergyman, and the power of Christian influence in the Church.

We have elsewhere given a summary of the proceedings of the Congress held at Norwich. We have only to add here that the fact of such a Congress being held from year to year with ever-increasing attendance, is a sign of the times which Christians would do well to ponder. It indicates the stirrings of a new life, which had slept for generations and may be productive of results as yet unthought of. Already it has taken its place as an institution of the day; and, as a representation of the different dioceses of the Church, of the various schools of theology within her borders, bids fair to supersede the old General Convocation. So much the more ought the Evangelical party in the Church to be vigilant for themselves, that what may, and probably will, become so powerful an organ of the Church, may not be wrested out of their hands.

We have so fully adverted in our other columns to the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Hull, that we need only here refer to our report, and to assure our readers that it will well repay perusal. The attendance was full, and the interest was kept flagging to the close.

THE JEW AND THE GREEK.

APART from all consideration, except of the most general kind, respecting the correctness or incorrectness of Mr. Gladstone's reasoning in his valedictory address as Rector of the University of Edinburgh, it must be pronounced satisfactory that an eminent statesman, heir-apparent to the leadership of the Liberal party, and prospective Premier of Great Britain, should have chosen as the theme of his address not any topic of political or literary interest, but one of a religious character. The circumstance not only proves that religion is a thing of supreme importance in the eyes of Mr. Gladstone, but that its importance is recognised by the public, and that it occupies the thoughts of men. That this is the case is involved in the very choosing of the subject by Mr. Gladstone. No man sees better than he "what main currents draw the years," what are the questions and interests which most deeply agitate the public mind; and in choosing a religious subject for discussion in his address, he evinced his conviction that the questions of the day are emphatically religious questions. And this is, we think, matter for congratulation. The worst of all states in reference to religion, whether on the part of the individual or on that of the nation, is that of indifference, and we have good hope that out of the religious agitation which now pervades the public mind will come a purifying of the general apprehension of Divine truth and a quickening of the zeal of Christians in work for their Master.

Mr. Gladstone assayed to solve before his Edinburgh audience an august and most difficult problem—the relation of the Jew to the Greek and the Greek to the Jew, in the evolution of the Divine scheme of human history. Rebuking, expressly or by implication, that narrow spirit which would shut the Divine influence within the boundaries of Palestine and the limits of the Hebrew kindred, he endeavoured to show that Greek civilisation was not without its mission and its message in the moral education of the race, and that, while the Hebrew Scriptures are pre-eminently and incomparably inspired by the Almighty, He did not leave himself without a witness during the ages of Hellenic civilisation, inasmuch as He not only gave fruitful seasons, but providentially guided men and nations to the discernment of certain great and imperishable truths.

To the more general thesis maintained by Mr. Gladstone no valid objection can be opposed. Besides the supernatural choosing and governing of the Jews by the Most High, there was a natural and providential preparing and guiding of other nations, especially of the Greek nation, for tasks appointed them. God was the God not of the Jew only, but also of the Greek. Nor can we take exception to the signalisation by Mr. Gladstone of the association of the human with the Divine as the highest truth embodied in Greek mythology and civilisation. He is doubtless right in affirming that, in representing the highest divinity under the form of a human being, the Greeks bore testimony to the doctrine of the Incarnation. It was, however, an indefinite, ambiguous, and confused testimony, and the religion of the Greeks afforded but a flickering and deceptive light to direct the wanderer through the moral night that envelopes humanity. Partly following Mr. Gladstone, partly supplementing his observations by remarks of our own, we propose to devote some small space to a discussion of his general subject—the contribution made respectively to the moral and spiritual civilisation of mankind by the Jew and the Greek.

"What advantage hath the Jew?" Such is the question which was put eighteen hundred years ago by the Apostle Paul, and Mr. Gladstone humbly and heartily accepts the apostolic answer, "Much every way, chiefly that unto them we committed the oracles of God." The Maker of man spake to the fathers and prophets of the Jews as He never spake to the Greeks. There was a special selecting of the Hebrew race, a Divine government of them through many ages, and a reflection record of that government in a Book, which Book was consequently entitled to be regarded as an oracle of God in a sense which could apply to no product of poetic philosophic genius in the best days of Greece. There is an inexhaustible fund of suggestion in this word applied by the Apostle to the Bible—the oracles of God. Of what other product, or collection of products, of the mind of antiquity could it be for a moment pretended that it came from God? The so-called oracles of heathenism were enigmatic guesses respecting the course of events, and the most authoritative documents on the character, powers, and qualities of the gods were poems claiming no higher inspiration than that of the Muses. In the moral speculations of the Greeks—even in those of the highest and best school, the Platonic—there was no rise, except fitfully and by glimpses, into the very conception of godliness. To every mind in which the moral instincts of our nature are unsophisticated, or in which by culture, they have been nursed into anything like purity and fervour, the primary idea of God must be goodness, and the primary conception of godliness, as a real quality in man, must also be inseparable from goodness. But the Greek philosopher in order to reach the very notion that goodness and God were one, had to sweep away from his mind, as a cloud-curtain obscuring the azure, all that mythologic system in which the populace believed, and in which the association between goodness and divinity was by no means exhibited. The result was that the best ethical writing in Greek literature was not in the strict sense religious—it did not urge the worship of the gods—and, not being godly, could not be called the oracles of God. What was religious in the literature and civilization of Greece was not moral, and what was moral was not religious. If we reflect for a moment upon the part played by the chief deity of the Greeks upon various occasions, and place it in contrast with that in which, with awful reverence the Hebrew Scriptures represent the Almighty as appearing, it seems hardly possible not to perceive that the Greek representation of deity was of earth, and the Hebrew representation of deity of heaven. Zeus appeared fighting with the Titans, a mere earthly warrior, though of extraordinary prowess. On numberless occasions he assumed foul or bestial disguises in order to effect infamous purposes. Neither by precept nor by example did he enforce morality. The very thought of comparing the God of Israel with a false god like this seems blasphemous, but it is only by so doing that the superiority of the religion of the Hebrews to that of the Greeks can be seen in its infinite character. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, appears first on the inspired page, not as a rude impersonation of material force, but as the Creator of the heavens and the earth, an Almighty Spirit, in whose hands all the forces of the material universe are as nothing, who is infinite in His power and wonderful in His working. On every occasion when He exerts His power it is a spiritual power. The sea divides at the stretching out of a rod; the rock opens when smote by the hand in the name of God, and the water gushes out. The angel of death touches the firstborn of Egypt, and they die. Here we have the conception of a spiritual and irresistible force generically unlike anything imagined of the gods of Greece. The difference is not one of degree, but of kind. The one is the human—nay, the basely and degradingly human—conception of Divine power; the other is the Divine proclamation of Infinite Might. Were it possible to conceive a contrast stronger than this, it would be afforded by the morality of the Greek deities as compared with the moral attributes of the God worshipped by the Jews. A defence—we had almost said a demonstration—of the supernatural character of the Hebrew religion is afforded by one event recorded in the history of the Jews. We allude to the giving of the law from Mount Sinai. The passage in which this is recorded is one of the most sublime in Scripture, and the occasion, in all its attendant circumstances, was perhaps the most solemn in the annals of the chosen people. Amid the thunderings of Sinai, amid the adoring, awestruck silence of the people, the supreme will of the Almighty was declared. And what was that will? The moral law. No effort of imagination is strong enough to conceive the chief of the Olympic deities proclaiming the law of the Ten Commandments. In those Sinai thunders a truth unknown to, or at least unrealised by, the world of classic antiquity—a truth of infinite and eternal importance—was enforced—namely, that the Governor of the world is a moral Governor, that the main purpose of God with man is to promote the goodness of the latter, thus subserving the glory of God, and that he who would do the will of God, must first of all keep the moral law. On that awful day, on the Mount of Sinai, was celebrated the marriage between religion and virtue, between godliness and goodness, which is indissoluble to all eternity.

In another point, well distinguished by Mr. Gladstone, the superiority of the Hebrew Scriptures to anything in the literature, mythology, or general civilisation of the Greeks, is conspicuous. The Greeks knew nothing of the spiritual experience of the soul. There is more on this head, as Mr. Gladstone admirably remarked, in the single Book of Psalms than in all that was ever written with Greek pen. Nor is the cause of this far to seek. As the Hebrew revelation set the Almighty, in the infinitude of His attributes, at an inconceivable distance above man, so also by revealing Him as a personal God, as a merciful God, as a God caring for and watching over His people, it brought Him near to all that called upon Him. "The Lord is my Shepherd"—where, if we ransack all the treasures of classic lore, will we find words breathing such a sense of personal confidence, personal affection, personal trust, as these words? What could the Greek understand by intercourse with the Deity, when his mind was bewildered by hundreds of gods and goddesses, most of them monsters of treachery, cruelty, and lewdness? Of a spiritual personal relation between himself and a Divine Being he had, in truth, no conception.

And we are thus led to the third particular, in which we specify the infinite superiority of the religion of the Hebrews to that of the Greeks—a particular which was indeed implied in the circumstances of superiority already specified, but which requires to be separately mentioned. We allude to the explicit announcement in the Hebrew Scriptures of the personality of the Divine Being. This was the first truth of the Hebrew religion, as it is of all religions; and without this truth the mythological system of the Greeks did not merit the name of religion at all. It is hardly too much to assert, that the very idea of God is the idea of one God, and that polytheism and atheism are essentially identical. God is the Infinite One. Unless we believe in the Infinite One, we do not believe in God. But the faith in One Infinite necessarily and obviously excludes the idea of more than One Infinite—that is to say, of more than one God. Had this idea of infinite power dawned upon the Greek, the instantancous result would have been that all the Olympian hierarchy, with its splendours and its poetry, would have shrivelled up into nothingness. And we are convinced that the idea of the infinitude of the Divine Being—an idea which is at the root of all possible religion, justly so called—was communicated to the mind of man in the religion of the Jews. Well, therefore, might the Apostle of the Gentiles say, "much advantage hath the Jew."

error and arrest its pernicious effects is good; but when this is pushed to intolerance, and when intolerance breaks out into persecution, the result is evil: On the whole history of Greece is written the lesson of moderation. The ideal of Greek philosophy was the golden mean. The ideal of Greek art was neither glaring colour nor gigantic size, but delicate and chastened perfection. No other nation so felicitously avoided the falsehood of extremes. Once more, the Greek has much to teach us under the head of intellectual culture. The mind of man is a whole, but a complex and balanced whole, which cannot be healthfully developed on one side without being developed on the other. And it would appear to be specially true that, in order to the healthful development of the moral part of our nature, the intellectual part must also be developed. The intellectual part of our constitution is more strictly the seeing part; the moral and emotional parts contribute the impelling force; and if the eye of intellect is not kept wide open, morbid conditions of conscience and of feeling will make wild work. The civilisation of the Jews—the supernaturally-communicated and inspired civilisation—was that of conscience; the civilisation of the Greeks was par excellence, though by no means exclusively, the civilisation of reason: and our Father in Heaven, who teaches both in revelation and in nature, both in Scripture and in providence, would have us give due attention to the one and to the other.

III.

CONTINUING our panoramic view from the summit of the Lebanon, B.C. 625, we still look southward, or rather, since the distance increases, we must suppose ourselves to pass through the air; and, hovering aloft at the "entrance in of Egypt," we throw a wondering glance, six hundred miles along, up the sun-lighted valley of the Nile. It is spring. On each side of the winding river, between the mountains, stretch the golden corn-fields; thousands of towns and villages are embowered in green overshadowing groves of palm and acacia from the burning noon (the "forest of Egypt cannot be numbered"), and, at short intervals, a long chain of stone-built cities nestle on the banks, lifting up their white walls beside the ancient stream. The marvellous valley is alive from end to end with men—those men the Egyptians, mighty in word and in deed, through three thousand years up till this day—a swarthy, bronze-coloured race, of gloomy, mystical temperament, of a formal genius, but of an unconquerable industry and skill; their priesthood the depository of all the wisdom of the ancient world.

The Nile is covered with fishing-boats and merchantmen; but the chief gathering of white sails is at the far-stretching wharves of two grove-girdled cities, of which one lifts up its stupendous monuments in the south, Thebes, or No-Ammon; the other, more modern, in the north, Noph, or Memphis. Each of these cities swarms with an innumerable population, comprising the nobility, priesthood, and professional men, and the factors of a trade which extends its relations over all the interior of Africa, and through the Red Sea over the coast of India and Ceylon. We look down on the matchless scene of art and industry, the accumulated result of so many centuries of thoughtful labour. See where the vast artificial lakes shine, half covered with the white floating lotus, among the palaces of kings and princes. See where the long banks of papyrus reed edge the waters, while a nation of fishermen angles from the brink. What buildings! Moun-

But now for our final flight across the Syrian desert towards the great eastern rivers, since the distance is too great for eyesight, even from the summit of the Lebanon.

As we pass aloft through the air, we see unnumbered strings of camels, laden with the all-various merchandise of Asia and Europe, intersecting the wilderness in every direction beneath our feet; but the two chief lines run north to Nineveh, high up on the Tigris, and south to Babylon, low down on the Euphrates. There lie beneath us, in their marvellous magnificence, these two cities; but the one is subject to the other, Nineveh, the ancient capital of the Assyrian Empire, holding Babylon in fee, as a provincial commercial metropolis.

The country that lies below was the earliest settled after the Flood, but it is one of the ugliest in the world. It is a damp, sloping plain, 3,500 feet lower in level than Jerusalem. We see, however, at once the reason of the early settlement of man in this fat, broad valley. The first wants of mankind are food and shelter, water and clothing, and these, when metals and tools are scarce, are required at the cheapest rate. The Euphrates and the Tigris then afforded water and alluvial soil—soil in which corn, cotton, and flax, would grow at once; their banks gave clay, which the hot sun baked into solid brick; and many bituminous springs supplied slime, which they mixed with reeds, and “had for mortar.” Hence were the chief wants of man easily satisfied. They could raise rich crops, they could find abundant water, they could build walls, palaces, towers, “whose top should reach to heaven.” So there, by the willows of Babylon, the early men sat down, designing to make it the centre of a universal monarchy, in easy communication with the north by the Great River, and with the south and east by the Persian Gulf. But God confounded their language, and scattered them. “Out of that land went forth Asshur, and founded Nineveh.” At the time of which we speak, Nineveh was the queen of the East, a vast old city, comprising an enormous congregation of mankind. Like Egypt, settled very soon after the dispersion, its monarchy was hoary with the snows of centuries. The grand old wicked lines of kings had issued for ages, like lions from their dens, and ravined, and “robbed, and strangled for their lionesses,” from the cataracts of the Nile to Tartary, on the borders of Hindostan. The fabric of the Assyrian Empire rose like a cloud-piercing cedar in the centre of Asia, and overshadowed the world. The broad parallel boughs stretched out their arms, and threw their stupendous shroud over the subject nations. “The waters made him great; therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his branches became long, because of the multitude of waters; and under his shadow dwelt all the great nations. The cedars in Eden could not hide him, and no tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.”

This ancient Nineveh (in the days of Jonah a city of three days' journey through) has grown larger and larger under the last line of kings, from Tiglath-Pileser until now, when its towering palaces shine with the wealth and glory of subjugated Asia. There it stands, stretching along both sides of the Tigris, shining with groves, gardens, and temples; its streets thundering with the tread of the proud multitude of traffickers, the roll of armed chariots, and the tramp of legions of cavalry and men of war. The whole Babel of Asiatic languages shrieks and clatters in its bazaars; the palaces of Esarhaddon and Sennacherib rise in gigantic grandeur upon their artificial terraces. The costly halls, roofed with engraven cedar and golden plate, decorated with vermilion cornices, present along their walls, on ground by Schamy), called the Chaldees, with their chief Nabopolassar at their head. They immediately became the masters of Babylon, and after a very short space of time spent in organising and consolidating their power, they joined with the Medes in the grand enterprise of overthrowing Nineveh, and with it the empire of Assyria.

We see, then, the fierce armies of provincial cavalry swarming from the north-east and south, like the locusts to whom Joel compares them, to the siege of Nineveh. The dominion of the world is now at stake; the life-and-death conflict rages in thunder outside the walls, and blood flows in torrents along the streets of the devoted city. It is sacked—it is doomed—it is burnt to ashes. The enormous area flames like a furnace along the river for miles. It is utterly forsaken; only a vast black scar on the earth marks its site. It has vanished like a vision of Pandemonium from the earth, amid the shouts of the whole continent of Asia. Soon, the embankments of the Tigris being neglected, the river overflows, and buries the ruins beneath beds of mud. "Its grave is made, for it is vile;" there let it lie. After twenty-four hundreds of years, two strangers from "the isles of the Gentiles"—a Frenchman and an Englishman—one Botta and one Layard—shall run their adventurous trenches through the mounds of earth that cover it, and expose to the astonishment of a new world the engraven slabs, the gigantic idols, and the burnt relics of the old.

Through the destruction of Nineveh the Babylonians and Medes became so powerful, as to raise the jealousy of the rival empire on the Nile. To put a stop to Nabopolassar's growing greatness, Pharaoh Necho, in the thirty-first year of Josiah, marched with a great army to the Euphrates, to make war upon Babylon. On taking his way through Judea, Josiah—who, no doubt, was in alliance with his rival, the new Emperor of the East—resolved to impede his march; and therefore, gathering together his forces, he posted himself in the valley of Megiddo, there to arrest the passage of the Egyptian army. On that fatal field fell the last glory of the Jewish nation; for after that dismal scene nothing ensued but a series of judgments, ending in the destruction of Jerusalem.

After various reciprocal invasions, in which the final advantage remained with the Babylonians, we find the Jewish kings submitted to Nebuchadnezzar.

Jehoiakim, however, after "serving Nebuchadnezzar three years," took advantage of the absence of the conqueror to renew his alliance with Pharaoh Necho. For this treachery the Babylonian monarch let loose upon the Holy Land the Ammonites, the Arabians, the Syrians, and the Moabites, who harassed him with incursions, and plundered him, like the modern Bedouins, on every side. At length they shut him up in Jerusalem, and dying, he was buried "with the burial of an ass"—the obsequies being suitable to the character of the defunct.

The year before his death died his great confederate, Pharaoh Necho. Nebuchadnezzar now, therefore, returns to the western shore, to put an end to the hesitating alliances of the Jewish kings, and to reduce Palestine to final submission. He soon made himself master of Jerusalem, and took thence all the treasures of the house of the Lord, and of the King's house, which Solomon had made. This more than Delphian wealth and spoil he carried with him back to Babylon; and in the centre of his army marched the whole military force of the Hebrew monarchy—10,000 soldiers out of the capital alone, besides the whole of the remaining nobility and landowners, and all the smiths, artificers, and builders, on whom he could lay his hand. At the head of the melancholy procession marched King Jehoiachin, his mother, his wives, and the officers of his palace. At this time also went Ezekiel into exile, and dwelt with God on the banks of the Ulai. Zedekiah was left King of Jerusalem.

IX.

At this time the word of the Lord came to Ezekiel, saying, "Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus. Every head was bald, and every shoulder peeled, yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will give the LAND OF EGYPT unto Nebuchadnezzar, and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey, and it shall be the wages of his army, for his labour, because they wrought for me, saith the Lord God."

Accordingly, the very year that followed on the siege of Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar, taking advantage of the intestine divisions that raged from north to south of Egypt, province being against province, and king against king, overran the whole land, made a miserable ravage and devastation therein, slaying multitudes of the inhabitants, profaning the temples, and loaded his forces with its incalculable wealth. Then the Nile a second time ran with blood, for the wrath of centuries was pouring itself out in the bitterness of Asiatic revenge upon the descendants of Rameses. "All that wrought in flax and fine linens were confounded. The fishers moaned, and the paper reeds by the brooks faded away." The land of Egypt was made desolate and waste, and her cities were crushed and emptied for forty years.

And now, amidst the wild exultation of his armies, this great conqueror sets out on his homeward journey, having completed the subjugation of the civilised world. Babylon had become the seat of universal empire. The description of Daniel was realised: "The Most High God had given Nebuchadnezzar a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour. And for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages trembled and feared before him. Whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive." "His heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride." There was no power on earth that could oppose him, and the powers of Heaven seemed to take delight in aggrandising his majesty, and establishing his throne.

Now rises Babylon into the culmination of its splendour. Nations are gathered around this potent centre. Transported nations are working as brickmakers, stamping on each brick the name of the conqueror. Nations dig out its ditches and build up its walls. They are nearly as deep and as high as the London Monument—enormous embankments faced with brick, at whose summit runs a road for chariots and horsemen. But higher than the walls rise the temples of the gods and the palaces and hanging gardens of the queen, planted with groves of trees from Armenia and Persia; and, higher than all, rises the gilded summit of the Temple of the Seven Spheres, the throne of Baal, who thence looked down upon a worshipping universe. The city is crowded with traffickers from every land. The East and the West pour their glory into her lap—"she sits as a queen, and says that she shall see no sorrow."

A grand festival, to be attended by deputies from all the subject tribes, is to celebrate the triumph of the conqueror. In the centre of their Champ de Mars, or Place de la Concorde, the plain of Dura, stands high aloft, on a pedestal of masonry, a gigantic image of plated gold, in honour of Bel, or Nebo. The height of the idol alone was ninety feet, blazing resplendent in the morning sunlight. "Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes, the governors, and the captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, and all the rulers of the provinces, to come to the dedication of the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. Then an herald cried aloud, To you it is commanded, O peoples, nations, and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp,

INTERNAL DIVISIONS AMONG THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

If you simply consider the surface of things, perfect order seems to reign in the Romish Church. The members of the flocks, the most devout at least, obey the priests; the curés are submitted to the prelates, and the bishops ask Pius IX. for their word of command, the rule of their conduct. This is very well: appearances are faithfully kept up. But more attentive observers discern beneath this artificial unity profound disagreement, and even passionate enmity.

The Monde, the principal organ of the Jesuits, has recently given a new proof of it, by publishing a very bitter article against the timid or the taciturn Romanists. What, then, is the grievance of the Ultramontane journal? It sharply reproves such Roman Catholics as M. de Montalembert, M. Albert de Broglie, and others, for having maintained perfect silence as to the late Encyclical and the famous "Syllabus," or catalogue of errors.

In the eyes of the ardent disciples of the Society of Ignatius Loyola this silence is criminal. It is not permitted to be silent and to stand aloof when the Pope has spoken. A solemn adhesion to all the Pontifical maxims is an imperious duty. The Monde has therefore challenged these personages, saying that they would commit a felonious or a treasonable action if they refused to approve, under an authentic form, the bulls of Pius IX.

No response has been made to these provocations of the Jesuit organ. Moderate Romanists are placed in the most equivocal and the most painful situation. On the one hand, they recognise in their inmost conscience that the Pope has fallen into serious exaggerations, and that he has compromised the cause of their Church before the tribunal of the civilised world. But on the other hand, they dare not avow their secret repugnances, because they regard themselves as soldiers who ought to remain passively faithful to the banner of their chief.

I have had the opportunity of hearing the reading of a letter from Count de Montalembert, which clearly explains his difficulties and his anxieties. He disapproves of the Encyclical of the Pope; he groans over the excessive and dangerous intolerance of the Court of Rome; but he would think he perpetrated an act of prevarication if he said aloud what he feels in his heart.

What a sad condition! Is it possible that enlightened men should long consent to stifle their thoughts and deepest convictions? I do not believe it is. There will be sooner or later a startling rupture between two parties so completely opposite.

THE CLERICAL PARTY EMBARRASSED BY THE CRITICAL POSITION OF THE PAPACY.

Another subject actively occupies the Jesuit press. You know that a part of the French garrison has begun to evacuate the City of the Vatican. Several battalions have already left, the rest will follow, and at the end of a year all our soldiers must return to France, according to the terms of the Franco-Italian Convention.

Now what will become of the temporal power of the Pope after the departure of our troops? That is the question. So long as Pius IX. was protected by French bayonets, the disciples of Ignatius fearlessly affirmed that the great majority of the inhabitants of Rome was ready to support the Pontifical Throne at the cost of its blood. But this pious imposture cannot survive in view of a near evacuation. It is the same with the confidence which the Jesuits affected to avow in the intervention of God in behalf of the Pope! These are vain words, which vanish before the reality.

The heads of the clerical party are perfectly persuaded that most of the citizens of Rome ardently desire to be united with their Italian fellow-countrymen, and that they will manifest their wishes with manly energy as soon as our regiments have resumed the road to their native land. The Ultramontanes are therefore seriously apprehensive, and have recourse to the most singular interpretations of the treaty of the 15th of September, to avoid the catastrophe with which they are threatened.

Thus they pretend that Victor Emmanuel is obliged not only to stop before the frontiers of the Pontifical territory, but to prevent the inhabitants of Rome from revolting against Pius IX. It would be, in truth, a strange spectacle to see the Italian soldiers fighting against their brethren of the Papal living God, so that they fall into the aberrations of Pantheism.

This is a main question in our present controversies, because the disciples of the new school have maintained in the conferences at Paris that they could be faithful and good Christians, while denying all miracles, even that of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. M. Bois proved this a pretence which cannot be accepted, a vain illusion, and his paper obtained the assent of the whole assembly.

Pastor Castel had to expound a more practical question — namely, the necessity of establishing a form of ordination. Some explanations are here indispensable.

In times past all the candidates for the holy ministry were obliged to admit and to sign our old Confession of Faith. This custom continued until the commencement of the nineteenth century. But since our Church has been united to the State, an excess of liberty has been demanded by the adherents of Rationalism in this matter. Every pastor who presides at the ordination of a candidate arrogates to himself the enormous privilege of composing a new formulary of consecration, or he even suppresses all formularies; so that many young men receive the titles and rights of pastors without having taken any precise engagement of faith and doctrine. This is an immense confusion, a disorder which opens the door to all opinions and all imaginable negations.

It is true that this deplorable state of things cannot be wholly corrected, save by the decisions of a General Synod. But meanwhile, till French Protestantism recovers the right of calling its national assemblies, it would be fitting and useful to promulgate a form of ordination which, having been sanctioned by the adhesion of numerous pastors and elders, would obtain a certain authority in our churches.

Such were the conclusions of the interesting and judicious paper of M. Castel. The assembly adopted them almost unanimously, and nominated a special commission, with instructions to prepare a programme for the meetings of next year.

In brief, the Conferences of the South produced a good impression. Our Evangelical pastors were encouraged in their resistance to the attacks of Radicalism, and the flocks will better understand that the faith of our forefathers still counts among us energetic and devoted advocates.

THE TOULOUSE RELIGIOUS BOOK SOCIETY.

I will say a few words, in conclusion, about the annual meeting of the Religious Book Society of Toulouse. This institution already reckons more than twenty-five years of existence. It was founded by the venerable Pastor Chabrand and the three brothers Courtois, whose piety, activity, and devotedness are well known in the Christian world.

The Toulouse Society has published and circulated millions of tracts or religious books, not only in France, but elsewhere in Europe, in America, and in all the countries of the globe where the French language is spoken. This work has been attended by abundant blessings.

Unhappily, there are now vacant places in the committee. M. Chabrand and two of the brothers Courtois have been called to a better world. These losses are very great and sad to the Toulouse Society. Let us hope that the Father of Mercies will raise up new and good workers to continue this task; for it is necessary, above all in our day, to oppose the corrupt press by books seriously Christian. GERMANY.

Frankfort, November, 1865.

THE PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION'S PUBLICATIONS SINCE ITS MEETING.

In recent letters I have already referred to the first general meeting of the Protestant Society or Association held last spring at Eisenach. We must, however, follow this movement in its developments and projects, for it represents the aspirations of a very numerous party in the National Churches of Germany. This is the party of the opposition, the left, to use a parliamentary expression; and it has taken the old name of Protestant (now generally disused in Germany, where the Church of the Reformation prefers the term Evangelical) for this reason: All who feel the necessity of protesting against the encroachments of Romanism, on the one hand; and, on the other, against the subjection of the Church to the State; against clericalism in our own churches, and also against the narrowness of official orthodoxy; are naturally favourable to this party. If its liberal character enlist public opinion on its side, it must also unhappily be said, that what in its doctrine is negative is not displeasing to those populations which have become strangers to the fundamental

RESOLUTION OF THE SYNODS OF THE RHINE AND OF WESTPHALIA.

The provincial synods of the Rhine and of Westphalia have this year held their session, in which both have taken an important resolution in the existing state of the National Church of Prussia. We know that the Constitution of that country, in its 15th article, decrees that the Church shall govern itself independently of the State, and by a representative or synodal system. Hitherto this article has remained almost a dead letter. It is true that the late King, Frederick William IV., had taken a half measure for detaching the Church from its political government, by the creation of an Ecclesiastical Council, dependent only on the King personally. It is true, moreover, that some provinces, presbyteries, parishes, and district synods have been established. But the Church, as a whole, has no organ, having no General Synod to deliberate and decide on its behalf. Now it is precisely this complete constitution of the Church which the synods of the Rhine and of Westphalia have decided to demand from the authorities. To this end, they have addressed a petition directly to the King, through the medium of the Ecclesiastical Council of Berlin. This resolution is the more important, inasmuch as, on one side, the politico-religious party actually dominant in Prussia is utterly opposed to this free constitution of the Church; and, on the other, these two synods represent the most flourishing and the most Evangelical churches of the kingdom. They cannot be accused of being inspired in their resolution by a false liberalism, which has been the charge made against the rationalistic party whenever they demanded this same ecclesiastical constitution. Their voice, moreover, should have the greater weight, inasmuch as the Church of these two provinces has been always in possession of a synodal constitution, which has powerfully contributed to the religious and moral superiority by which it is distinguished. We might, therefore, at another time, hope for the success of this movement, but now that is impossible! Moreover, the political and religious journals which regard absolutism as the only safeguard and blessing of the State, as well as of the Church, have bestirred themselves to oppose the petition of the synods of the Rhine and of Westphalia.

Thus everywhere do we behold strife and conflict. We must not be troubled beyond measure at this, for agitation is better than

OF COLOGNE.

Shall we find more peace and concord if we now contemplate the Roman Catholic Church of Germany? I doubt it. We have more than once had occasion to refer to its internal conflicts. At this present moment the important affair of the election of the Archbishop of Cologne, to which, long ago, I called the attention of your readers, has not yet been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. This election is made by the chapter of the diocese, subject to the ratification of the King, at Berlin, and of the Pope, at Rome. Now the poor electors, who have to assure themselves beforehand of this double approbation, on the part of authorities, frequently opposed, have not yet been able to ascertain what names will be accepted by them both. It is now re-asserted, on the authority of advices received from Rome, that these long-continued efforts are on the point of culmination.

We shall return to this subject.

A CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.

The great project of the foundation of a university exclusively Catholic, to which we recently referred, has to contend with insurmountable difficulties. It is even falling somewhat into ridicule. We should state that an association of noble ladies, under the patronage of an archduchess of Austria, was formed in order to collect funds for this object. It published an appeal, which has met with an unhappy fate. For behold a taceat mulier in ecclesia, which arose from an altogether unexpected quarter. A Roman Catholic priest wrote as follows in the Colnische Blätter, a journal itself Roman Catholic: "If these ladies had said, 'Certain learned men regard as necessary the foundation of a Catholic university; the German bishops and the Holy Father have approved this project; and as it is a good work, we wish to contribute to it by means of our pen, and, with this view we appeal to the ladies and young women of Germany'—every one would have approved the scheme. But to publish so long an appeal, referring to the tutelage of the State over the Church, to State examinations, philosophy, medicine, the supernatural light of faith, the obscurities of philosophical speculation, the essence of things and their appearance, of reason without God, of creatures and of men, &c.,—to pub-received an unsatisfactory answer. This year the Westphalian Synod, which met in the last week of September, discussed many interesting questions, respecting home missions, lay agency, and collections, and voted an address of sympathy to our faithful brethren in the Grand Duchy of Baden. But the chief attention of the synod was directed to the independence of the Church. A petition to the King was adopted by a great majority, praying his Majesty to grant to the Church the promised independence, and to order the formation of synods in the Eastern Provinces. The members of the Rhenish Synod, which met a week later, sent a similar petition to the Supreme Consistory, wherein they answer some of the objections made, and give an assurance that it is not their intention to break down hastily the old historical union of Church and State, but that they only wish that moderate independence which they think indispensable for the development of the Church. The synod also suggest for consideration how best to employ laymen in the service of the Church, and draw attention to the wants of our large congregations, which one clergyman alone cannot possibly meet.

In the province of Brandenburg the different district synods met in the course of this year. The Consistory of this province has recently published a general review of the debates, and expresses its great satisfaction at the results. The Consistory adopts most of the measures proposed by the synods, chiefly in reference to the parochial councils. The members of these councils are to be remembered in the prayers of the Church, they are to have places of honour in the Church, they are to take the care of the poor into their hands, they are to report every year upon their proceedings, they are to circulate good books, and they are to take into consideration the few remaining provisions for ecclesiastical discipline. We can but see with satisfaction that a tendency pervades our era to give laymen a more prominent part in church matters, and to keep the Church free from the changeable influence of a political government. But, on the other hand, we cannot be blind to the difficulties which are presented, especially to those which are the necessary consequence of the National Church system. And that is why most of the earnest Christians of this country look with a sort of anxiety on coming events. How will it be possible to draw into activity only those laymen who are living members of the Church of Christ? Shall a man who knows no more of religion than that he has been baptized in infancy be allowed to use his influence to bring his erroneous doctrines into the Church? The masses of our people are spiritually dead; there is only a small and select number of those who are really transplanted into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. Besides, there is here a great animosity between believers and unbelievers, which is due not a little to the political conflicts of our days. The events of the last few years, and especially the debates in Parliament, have shown too plainly that the leaders of the political Radicals are hostile to all true religion, and that they only claim the independence of the Church in order to gain it for their unbelief. The Christians, on the other hand, have been too apt to identify political Conservatism with religion; so that we have not even a right to hope that the lifeless members of the Church will abstain from their right of election. Another difficulty is this, that the Christians as yet are so little accustomed to take an active part in Church matters, and must first be trained for this work.

RELIGIOUS EFFORT.

I am glad to turn from these thoughts to the brighter aspect of the efforts made here for the spread of the Gospel. You are aware that an Association for Building Churches was formed here last year. Dr. Kögel, one of the chaplains to the King, started it by drawing the attention of Christians to the great disproportion of the numbers of inhabitants in this city to the places of worship. The society has no means to build large churches. It only wishes to remedy the immediate need by erecting temporary chapels, in which congregations may be gathered. This voluntary effort of Christians is a living testimony to the value they attach to the blessings of the Gospel, and will, I hope, aid in opening the eyes of those whose duty it is to help, and who have the means to do so. The first of these temporary chapels was opened on Sunday, the 1st of October. Crowds came to the opening service, so that though I was there before it commenced, I, in common with many others, was unable to obtain admission. The Lord has already visibly blessed the new congregation, and it was a great pleasure to see the crowd of happy children flocking there last Sunday, as the new Sunday-school connected with it was opened.

This season of the year—the beginning of the winter—having brought many persons back to town, this month is very rich in religious meetings and anniversaries. The account of all these meetings is apt to warm the heart. So in this very week three missionaries were ordained. On Tuesday and yesterday four deaconesses received the blessing of the Church in their new vocation. The St. Elizabeth Hospital, which was erected by Gossner, is about to be enlarged by a new building, the foundation stone of which was laid on the 24th of last month. The King, the Queen Dowager, and many of the King's Ministers, joined the great and solemn assembly. Dr. Büchsel, known in England by his "Ministerial Experiences," preached the sermon. The King himself and the Queen Dowager gave the first strokes of the hammer. The walls of the new building, which were as yet only six to eight feet high, were beautifully decorated with flowers, and with black and white flags. You seldom miss the latter on such occasions, because we Prussians like to be reminded by those beloved colours to pray for God's richest blessings on our Sovereign and on our country. From the provinces, also, the papers of this month bring a great variety of religious news. Our friends in Potsdam are meeting a great want by erecting there a new asylum for idiot children. A numerous assembly of clergymen met in Dantzic. Questions as to the duty of the Church towards prisoners, the character of Evangelical liberty, the right moments for the Church to speak and to be silent, were discussed, and many refreshing meetings arranged. A similar conference took place at Gumbinnen. The testimony of St. Paul to the resurrection of our Saviour, and the most important duties of home missions, were the subjects of discussion. The conference which meets every half year in Gnadau, met in the first week of October and dwelt on the duties of Christians in relation to the great social questions of the day, and on the claims which the laity have a right to make on their clergy.

STATUE TO PHILIP MELANCTHON.

The 31st of October, which is kept annually in remembrance of the Reformation, was specially celebrated this year by the erection of a statue to the Reformator Melancthon in the old town of Wittenberg, where Luther first preached the great doctrine of salvation by faith alone. There were many visitors on the occasion, and the splendid weather favoured the assembly. On the evening before, the Universal Halle arranged the proceedings for the 31st. Divine service was celebrated at eleven o'clock. This over, the inhabitants and the visitors formed into a long procession and advanced to the market-place, where Melancthon's statue was still veiled. Dr. Hoffmann delivered an address on Melancthon as the teacher of believing science. While he was speaking, the covering removed from the statue, and the sun just fell on the beautiful work of art. At the close of the proceedings, the speaker, who was present on the occasion, said a few words by way of acknowledgment to the speakers, the artist, and those who arranged the festivities.

ITALY.

THE NEW CIVIL CODE: ITS RELIGIOUS BEARING.

I have lately been perusing with deep interest the printed official copy of the new Civil Code, which comes into operation on the 1st January next. You remember that when the annexations of Tuscany, Lombardy, Emilia, and the southern provinces were effected, many delicate questions arose in the administration of the law, owing to the diversities in the civil and criminal codes of these different duchies and kingdoms. A parliamentary committee was appointed four years ago to bring order out of this confusion, and the result is now before us in a document, already approved of by both houses of Parliament and signed by the King, which places the young kingdom of Italy at least on a level with Western nations. The bearing of this magnificent piece of legislation on religion is that which will most interest your readers. It is the heaviest blow dealt to the Papacy in the land of its former sovereign sway. From the beginning of next year men of every creed are at liberty to call in the services of their religious teachers on all solemn occasions in the lives of citizens; but that which gives value to the various acts connected with the law of marriage or baptism, the marriage or interment of an Italian subject, from the Alps to Mount Etna, is the registration at the Comuni of the presence of the civil servant of the Government on these interesting occasions. In this the power of the priest is greatly abridged. Complicated have been the questions, especially in relation to marriage, not only among native Evangelicals, but also between Italian and British Protestants, such as have these difficulties given to the friends of evangelization resident here, that now that the new law speaks so clearly and advantageously, the Claudian Press has issued in a cheap and portable form that part of the Civil Code referring to marriage, accompanied by explanations from the pen of Dr. de Sanctis, in order that the scattered Evangelicals may be made thoroughly aware of their privileges.

THE CHOLERA — WITHDRAWAL OF FRENCH TROOPS FROM ROME.

Two things have greatly raised the spirits of the Italians lately. The first is the gradual diminution of the cholera, which still lurks about a few dirty villages on the Adriatic coast, south of Ancona, and hangs threateningly about the town and outskirts of Naples, but which as a plague is now stayed in Italy. Indeed, there is less cholera here now than in France or Spain. The other subject of intense gratification is the evident resolution of France to maintain her word of promise in the matter of withdrawing her troops from Rome. The vessels of war from Toulon have now removed the first instalment of 4,000 men from the Pope's circumscribed dominions. And so we look on patiently and silently to see the high destinies of a united Italy fulfilled. What the Pope will do to keep down his refractory subjects no one can tell. At present he is increasing his army by a few thousand men, and as recruits are slow in presenting themselves in the Papal States, they are being quietly smuggled in from abroad, under an inducement of high pay and stirring scenes. De Merode, the warlike Minister of Pio Nono, either from enfeebled health or change of policy on the part of the Roman Court, is replaced at the War-office by Cardinal Antonelli.

THE KING AND ECCLESIASTICAL REFORM.

The King of Italy is personally much beloved by his subjects. He has won their affection still more, and made himself the object of universal admiration, by his recent visit to Naples, where the cholera has threatened to assume alarming proportions. On the route he was cheered most enthusiastically by the country people, who would fain have unyoked the horses and drawn the carriage of his Majesty miles and miles in triumph; and many a blessing was invoked upon his head by the poor patients in the cholera hospitals of Naples, which he repeatedly visited. It is well known that the King was only restrained by his Ministers from going to Ancona last summer, when the plague was at its height; but the importance of Naples as the late capital of the Two Sicilies outweighed in the Royal mind all considerations of personal danger. A happier stroke of policy could not have been suggested than this impromptu act of sympathy.

Florence is to-day all gaiety, though the sky is sombre and the rain falls heavily. Banners are hung from every edifice, and the whole town is illuminated to celebrate the opening of the second Italian Parliament this forenoon, in the presence of 450 deputies and a brilliant assemblage of foreign and native onlookers. The speech of the King, delivered in the grand old Cinquecento Hall, built by Savonarola for the freemen of Florence, is manly and practical. You will be surprised to hear that the two passages which were received with loud, unanimous, and prolonged applause, were those in which he referred to the breaking off of intercourse with the Pope, when proposals offensive to the Crown and the nation had been made, and in which he mentioned that the Cabinet would immediately submit bills for "the separation of Church and State," and the suppression of religious corporations. The progress of public opinion in Italy during the last five years, especially on ecclesiastical matters, is very remarkable, and equals the advance made by other lands in a century. When the Marquis Pepoli in Umbria, and Valerio in the Marches, abolished religious houses, it appeared to many a most daring and premature act. When Petrucci laid before Parliament his project for the establishment of the civil rights of the Italian clergy, he was treated as a madman, and the bill refused a first hearing, and yet it contained, as one of its clauses, the reduction of the dioceses of the country by one-half—a measure which a recent Ministerial circular has shown to be absolutely necessary. When Pisanelli tabled his proposal with respect to convents and ecclesiastical property, the Ministry to which he belonged showed that it regarded the measure as rash; for it was a committee of the Chamber of Deputies, headed by the present Minister of Grace and Justice, that, reporting on the bill, first suggested in the most formal manner the imperative necessity for the total abolition of all religious orders. And yet again, when Vacca brought forward what he thought a far more radical measure than that of Pisanelli, the House was so far from judging the proposal sufficient, that the amendment of Ricasoli was adopted, insisting on the separation of Church and State. Many a one con-time to return to the barracks. It interested and encouraged me that the first and most numerous of my visitors were old acquaintances of Miss Burton, of which Signora they anxiously inquired, spoke of respectfully, and longed to see her at Naples. Amongst the 5th and 6th Regiments of Grenadiers, at Florence in 1863-4, some showed by their conversation that her work had not been in vain, at least intellectually. None but those who have been engaged in similar work can realise the difficulty of making known the Gospel, the simple Gospel, to those poor, generally ignorant, and often superstitious and suspicious people. Yet, in general, they listen silently and in wonder, like children. As my work continued it interested me more and more, so that I grieved on leaving. Many were interested in the Word—one, a professed infidel, now a believer in Christianity, became my most regular attendant. During my stay, through the kindness of Miss Burton and the Bible Society, 500 tracts and books, 450 Gospels and Epistles, and some New Testaments, were distributed by me to the above-named regiments.

THE WALDENSIAN COLLEGE, ETC.

The work in Italy has to mourn the loss of Signor Rimathei, a native of the canton of the Grisons, who became a subject of Divine grace in Corsica, and has laboured for years at Spezia, Cremona, &c., until lately, when he was removed to the sanctuary above.

A Young Men's Christian Association has just been instituted in Florence, similar to that in Turin, and after the model of the same societies in Britain.

The Waldensian College has opened its winter session with thirteen students, one of whom is from Turkey, another from Lombardy, and several from Sicily and the Vaudois valleys. This winter, in addition to the three regular professors—Mr. Appia, of Naples, having accepted the post vacated by Mr. Ehni—Dr. De Sanctis (whose recent work, entitled "Papal Rome," has been honoured by the Pope with a place in the Index) is appointed to give an extra course of lectures on the history of the rise of the errors of the Church of Rome, and on other controversial subjects; a course for which Dr. de Sanctis is peculiarly fitted, and which is so necessary for young men who so shortly will be engaged over the country in constant warfare with the priests.

IMPROVED STATE OF FEELING AMONG ITALIAN PROTESTANTS.

Without entering into particulars, which it would be premature to mention, and which it is impossible to relate so as to satisfy the various parties, I am happy to say that a growing feeling towards brotherly kindness and united effort prevails among all the ranks of Italian Evangelicals. I have already noticed, in former letters, as evidences of this, the meeting at Bologna of the Free Italian Brethren, the Milan Committee, and the movement of Signor Gavazzi. To these may now be added an attempt at a better understanding among the Christians in Florence, the address of all the Evangelists maintained by the Methodists to the Wesleyan Committee, and a pamphlet on "A True Evangelical Alliance," by a Milanese Evangelical. In referring to these things I am far from saying that anything has as yet been accomplished. Nevertheless, it is of itself a great advance that, all over the country, the need is felt of organization, fellowship, and union.

EVANGELIZATION IN NAPLES.

Of late you have heard little of the ordinary work of evangelization in Naples. The following are extracts from the interesting private letter of Signor Gregori, an evangelist in that large town:—

To speak the truth, the Lord has amply blessed, and has himself supplied the means for the increase of brotherly fellowship among the members of the Church and the progress of the good cause. These means have been the sick and controversy.

We had at the end of August three sick persons on our roll, one at the hospital, and the other two in their own houses. One of these last, a certain C—, had never been either a member or catechumen of the Church, but declared himself an Evangelical, and sent for us when he saw that his illness was seemingly unto death. He was so well acquainted with the Bible, that I can scarcely say whether he was more edified by our visits or we by our intercourse with him. The other, a certain G—, had been last year on the list of catechumens, but for many months we had seen nothing of him. Both of these were labouring under consumption. The last mentioned has an Evangelical brother, but the other members of the family are Catholic. His family used every means to make him confess. They sent a priest, and then a monk to him, with this object in view, but he remained firm to his principles. As I was not quite certain of his faith in Christ, I asked him one day why he would neither confess nor receive the priest. He fixed his eyes upon me with surprise, and then said, "I remember that last year you spoke otherwise, when in expounding the Bible you showed us that there was no other name given under heaven among men whereby we can be saved, except the name of Christ. This I believed, for Christ died for me. His blood alone can wash me from every sin, and to Him, therefore, I have recourse, and am certain to be heard. Consequently, I have nothing to do with the priest." His faith in the Saviour went on daily increasing, so much so, that his family, seeing they could not succeed in getting him to confess, did all in their power to send him to the hospital, hoping that there he would be forced to do what they wished. In the meantime the other sick man, C——, was likewise obliged to go to the hospital, and thus we had brought together my three sick friends. G—— was the most seriously affected of the three, so that his family begged the priests to convert him. This I had foreseen, and therefore had spoken to the director of the establishment, who was most obliging, and showed me from the regulations that the hospital was open to all, without distinction of race or religion. He further prohibited the priests from approaching the beds of the Evangelicals, and taking down my address, he handed it about to all the keepers of the ward, and told them that whenever a sick Evangelical asked for a minister of religion, they were to send and seek me out, at whatever hour, by night or by day.

By this time the brethren had heard of the unkind treatment to which his family had subjected G——, and they came daily in crowds to visit him. I was obliged to pass three nights at the hospital when G—— was approaching his latter end, lest the servants or priests should disturb him. At last he died, and we carried him, as is our custom, to our own cemetery, after having spoken a good deal in the hospital, while we were removing the body, in the hearing of a large audience.

The other two sick men are still in life; one of them is rather improving, but the other will not last over this month, and they are visited by numerous fellow-Christians.

Well, I said that God had made use of means for uniting more closely the Evangelical of Naples in the bond of charity. At the side of the dying man, and over the newly grave of our brother, it would appear as if had better recognised each other, and there aside our mutual suspicions and calumnies. can truly say with St Paul, that all things, death, work together for the good of those love God.

The letter closes with an earnest entreaty for a third Waldensian evangelist to be sent to Naples, in order to overtake the necessary duties of the work already in hand.

EVANGELICAL SCHOOLS IN NAPLES.

From another quarter I regret to learn that last summer several misfortunes befallen the excellent and numerous Evangelical schools in Naples. The best of masters is now a confirmed invalid, and been obliged to resign; and Mr. Long, Normal School teacher, has removed his school in the valleys, so that at present the institution is closed.

TURKEY.

Constantinople,

November 4, 1865.

THE TRUE POLICY OF ENGLAND IN TURKEY.

Sir Henry Bulwer has gone; Lord Lyons has taken his place. One may now hope for some change of policy at the Embassy. It has been my unpleasant duty to write much during the past year in opposition to the policy of Sir Henry Bulwer and the present Turkish Government. It might be inferred from this, that I would favour such changes as would lead to the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire and the establishment of some new Government at Constantinople. Such an inference would be incorrect. I believe that the English Government is right in its determination to defend the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, so long as it can be done without injury to the people of Turkey. The present Government of Turkey, if rightly guided, may be the best Government possible for many years to come. The Turks have long been the ruling race. With all their faults, they know how to rule better than any of the other nationalities in the empire. Those portions of the empire where their rule is absolute are better governed, and subject to fewer abuses, than the half-independent provinces of European Turkey. The different Christian communities would prefer to be governed by the Turks rather than by a rival Christian sect.

The Armenians, for example, dislike the Turks, but they hate the Greeks; and the Greeks would much rather be governed by the Turks than the Armenians; they hate the Turks but they despise the Armenians. Those who favour the restoration of a Greek Empire as an improvement upon a Mussulman Government, know but little of the minds of the Greeks, and give but little heed to events which are transpiring in the present kingdom of Greece. I can safely say that there are not two millions of people in the empire who would not rebel against the Greek Government at Constantinople at once. The Greek people are hated, not the Armenians alone, but by at least three-fourths of the members of the Greek Church in Turkey. The overthrow of the present Government would, undoubtedly, be followed by long years of terrible anarchy. I believe that it is not simply the selfish desire to maintain the balance of power and destroy the Asiatic empire which leads British statesmen to uphold this Government, but is, not less, the knowledge of such facts as have been suggested above.

The real question, about which we differ, is how the empire shall be maintained. What policy shall be adopted to strengthen this Government at home and abroad? It was said in Lord Stratford's time, that he took the Sultan under his tutelage, really ruled the empire himself. Sir Henry Bulwer declares that Lord Stratford's administration was a failure, and that the famous Hatti-humayoun which he procured did more harm than good. It has been often said of Sir Henry, that he was more a Turk than the Turks themselves, and this remark is not an unfair representation of his policy. His general aim has been the same as was that of Lord Stratford—to strengthen and consolidate the Turkish power; but he has sought to do this by reviving the old spirit of Mohammedanism, and by becoming himself the servant rather than the master of the Porte. It is not my place to defend or condemn either Lord Stratford or Sir Henry Bulwer, but it cannot be denied that under the former British influence was supreme in Constantinople, while under the latter French influence has generally been in the ascendancy; and France, at heart, desires, not the preservation, but the dismemberment of Turkey. With France, Russia, and Austria against him; with Turkish Ministers who are governed only by the desire to keep their places, and care but little for the general prosperity of the empire; with political complications of every kind in Egypt, Syria, and European Turkey—Lord Lyons has no easy task before him; but it may be safely laid down as an axiom, that a Government is strong in proportion as it is a blessing to the people. If the Sultan's Government becomes more and more oppressive and burdensome to the people, it will grow weaker, in spite of all diplomacy; but if it becomes more enlightened and liberal, it will become stronger, notwithstanding the intrigues of France and Russia. If fanaticism is fostered and religious liberty curtailed, the empire will be weakened, the process of disintegration will go on, and the Government will lose all its hold upon the affections of the people. The neglect of public improvements, and the increase of taxation within the past few years, have done more to hasten the downfall of the empire than all that Sir Henry has done to uphold it; the refusal of justice to the Bulgarians, and the persecutions of last year, were, if anything, more unfortunate still. I would have all the power and influence of Great Britain exerted to maintain the Turkish empire; but I believe that it will be exerted in vain, unless it is able to secure religious liberty, material progress in public improvements, and more just and equitable taxation. It is, of course, impossible to form an opinion now as to the position which Lord Lyons is to take in reference to these questions, but he has thus far made a most favourable impression upon all who are interested in the welfare of Turkey, and in the maintenance of British influence here. We feel that a new day has dawned upon us.

PROGRESS OF THE MISSIONARY WORK IN TURKEY.

The present position of the missionary work in Turkey is, on the whole, more favourable than it has been for many years.

In Constantinople, for some years past, an unpleasant state of feeling has existed among a portion of the native Protestants towards the American missionaries; and, as always happens under such circumstances, they have misunderstood each other's feelings upon many important points. This has been the case especially with the Protestant church in Pera, as your readers are already aware from correspondence which has been published in Evangelical Christendom. Although such difficulties are common in all missionary fields, and are, perhaps, to be expected as the result of human weakness, they are, nevertheless, most serious obstacles to spiritual progress. I am happy to be able to report that there now seems to be every prospect of renewed harmony of action, and of more united and successful efforts for the evangelization of this city. Indeed, all the Protestant congregations are now much larger than they have been in past years. Even the Mussulmans seem to be regaining the courage which was so effectually subdued by the persecutions of last year. They once more begin to visit the missionaries, and even to attend the religious services of the Sabbath.

The Government is still very watchful, and the past week has given evidence that the houses of the Christian Turks are constantly watched by spies, but there have been no acts of persecution like those of last year.

The work among the Bulgarians has not progressed as rapidly as it was expected five years ago that it would, but those hopes were based upon political movements, which are still progressing, and which have thus far proved, at least, very favourable to the dissemination of religious truth. In their final result they may even yet emancipate the Bulgarians from the corruptions of the Greek Church. Great numbers of the better-educated classes are already Protestants at heart, and would not hesitate to declare themselves such if they could hope to carry the masses with them.

Whatever the result may be of these political movements, now is the time to sow the seed of the truth in Bulgaria, for now it is readily received by almost all.

In Asiatic Turkey the work is progressing at all points. A Protestant pastor has just been ordained over the flourishing church in Cesarea; and more than 700 persons were present at the religious services on the occasion. This city, which lies just in the centre of Asia Minor, is not only important in itself, but is also the centre of a most prosperous missionary work among the villages and towns of that pashalic.

The well-known success of the Protestant movement in Aintab, Marash, Oorfa, and other places in that part of Turkey, is fully sustained, in spite of the death of several of the missionaries in that field; and a work of very similar character seems to be going on in Northern Asia Minor, south of Broosa, in towns like Murad Tchai, where within a year large Protestant communities have sprung up, and the people seem to be thoroughly in earnest, ready to help themselves, and to labour for their neighbours.

In Eastern Turkey the progress of the work is equally encouraging, and the people seem to be taking hold, in good earnest, of the principle that they must support their own religious institutions, and not be forever dependent upon foreign aid. This is, perhaps, at once the most difficult and the most necessary lesson which mission churches have to learn. I know of no Protestant church established by the American missionaries in Turkey which has not at least begun to learn this lesson, and many of them are nearly or quite self-supporting.

The boarding schools of the American mission at Philipopolis and Eski Zagra, for Bulgarian boys and girls, are in a very favourable condition, both in respect to the number of pupils and the influence exerted upon them. The schools at Marsovan, Kharpoot, Aintab, and in Syria, for instruction in theology, and for female education, are accomplishing everything which could be hoped from them, in providing the people with an educated ministry and invaluable female teachers. In short, there is everything to encourage the Church to new faith and zeal in the great work of evangelising the world. If there are many in England who are giving up the Bible, and turning from the Word of God to superstition or infidelity, there are many poor souls in Turkey who are finding in this same Bible a Saviour and eternal life.

DEATH OF TURKISH CONVERTS.

I reported a few months ago the sudden death of Selim Effendi (Rev. Edw. William) and I have now to report the death of another Turkish Christian. Rev. Mahmud Effendi, who was formerly a major in Turkish service, and who was afterward converted to Christianity, and admitted to ordination in the Church of England, died to-day, of a protracted illness. At the time of his death he was in the service of the Gospel Propagation Society; and it is not many months since he took part in the services of laying the corner-stone of the Memorial Church. During his illness he conversed very freely and at great length with clergymen and friends who visited him; and I believe that he made a deep impression upon all that he was a sincere convert, and was dying in full faith in Jesus Christ.

The other convert was named Abdi. He was formerly an Imam, and was an old man at the time when he was baptized by Rev. Dr. Schaffner, five years ago. He was imprisoned about two months last year, at the time of the general persecution, and was then banished, first to Aidin, and afterward to Smyrna. A short time since he returned to Constantinople, and he died suddenly a few weeks since in his house. This being in the Turkish quarter, and his family being Mussulmans, we know nothing of the circumstances of his death.

While these two men have been called away from earth, others are appearing to take their places. One was openly baptized in an interior city two months ago, who has literally suffered loss of all things for Christ's sake. He has been imprisoned, beaten almost to death, and subjected to horrible torture. He has had his wife, his children, and his large property taken from him, and given to other more faithful Mussulmans. He has persisted, in spite of all this, in remaining in his native city, and there he has been openly baptized. As yet no notice has been taken of this by the Turkish authorities or people there.

END OF THE PERSECUTION AT ISTANBUL.

In a late number of Evangelical Christianity I gave some account of a terrible persecution in Istanbul, a small town near Angora. The end of this is too good to be lost to your readers. An appeal to Constantinople, enforced by English influence, brought to Angora an order from the Porte that full justice be done to the Protestants of Istanbul. This order fortunately arrived while Rev. Mr. F——, American missionary at Cesarea, was there. He took it in his own hand to the Governor of Istanos, and requested him to see it executed. The persecutors were strong and influential, and the Governor tried to conciliate, but when pressed he ordered the leading Armenians of the town to appear at his public court and listen to the reading of the order from the Porte. Mr. F—— was also invited to be present. The reading of the order was followed by a long, free, and general conversation on religious liberty. After being driven from all their defences, the civil head of the Armenians said: "We live here in one corner of the world, and do not well know what is going on. We thought that we could persecute, but we were mistaken. We now learn that the Sultan has granted liberty of conscience to all, and who are we, that we should oppose him? Let us henceforth live in brotherly love." The Turkish officers joined heartily in condemning the Armenians for their persecution of the Protestants; and finally the priests said, "Well, let us become brethren again." Mr. F—— suggested that this was well, but that it would be still better to send a herald through all the streets of the city to proclaim that "henceforth Protestants are to be treated as brethren." "Very good," said that Governor, "that is quite right," and all the Turkish effendis joined at once in support of the proposition. Accordingly a herald was called, and this written paper given him to read through the city: "It is commanded by the ruling authorities that all subjects cease to deride one another as Mussulmans and rayahs, or as Armenians and Protestants, since all are equally the dependent subjects of the Imperial Government; and it is further commanded that, mutually respecting and honouring one another, all shall dwell together in brotherly love." This the herald took, and beginning under the windows of the room where the council was sitting, cried it out as with the voice of a trumpet, always adding, "Take good heed that henceforth no man say, 'I did not understand it.'" The persecutors were overwhelmed with chagrin and astonishment, but the proclamation seems to have done its work, for from that day there has been no more persecution of Protestants in Istanos.

WEST INDIES.

THE RECENT OUTBREAK IN JAMAICA.

The Freeman publishes the following letter from a missionary in Jamaica, whose name, for obvious reasons, is concealed. It contains a view of the matter somewhat different from that which has been given in other quarters. The letter is worthy of a careful perusal:—

October 23, 1865.

This packet will bring you sad accounts from our apparently doomed island. As I shall send papers I will not go into details, but give you my opinion in reference to the unhappy occurrences which have taken place. Let me, however, first caution you against believing all that the papers say. The white people killed amount in all, including the soldiers, to about twenty, but the mutilation of the bodies after death I do not yet believe in. Whatever the Kingston papers reported in the midst of the excitement unfavourable to the people, will be adhered to, however untrue they may afterwards find the report to be. In the second place, I should like you to know that the large district in which the outbreak has taken place has been sadly neglected in a religious point of view. It has one or two resident Wesleyan missionaries residing near the sea coast, but the whole of the mountain district has been unblest by missionary influence. We, as a body, have no influence whatever there. About two years ago Mr. H—— and myself travelled through the district with a view of finding some localities where some home missionaries could be stationed. One native brother was sent, and has been working with considerable success for about a year, but the want of funds prevented us from doing more.

The cause of the outbreak is not difficult to be found, though I could not have believed that there were any persons in the island so full of bitterness towards the white people. The island has, you are aware, been suffering from a severe drought, which has made labour very scarce and provisions very dear. The wages of the people, never much more than one shilling per day, have fallen thirty, and in some districts fifty per cent. In consequence of the American war, all imported goods rose in price to an extent to place them beyond the reach of the masses of the people. Thus everywhere the people found themselves suddenly deprived not only of the comforts, but of the very necessities of life. It was thought that Government for a time would have removed or lowered the high duties which are placed upon everything imported into the island, especially as the revenue was increased in proportion to the price of the articles imported. Thus, for instance, calico, an article of necessity, always pays a duty of twelve-and-a-half per cent., but as the price of this article was trebled, it virtually paid a duty of thirty-eight per cent. The duty on flour at the time of the greatest scarcity was forty per cent. Thus, while there was the greatest scarcity in the land, the coffers of the Government were better filled than ever, and the time was seized upon by the authorities to increase, for the benefit of the few, the expenditure of the country. You can easily understand how such conduct on the part of the Government would create discontent amongst the masses, many of whom were positively wanting food, and not a few old people died because they could not obtain it.

In the midst of all this, Dr. Underhill, knowing the true state of things, wrote a letter to Mr. Cardwell, Secretary of State for the Colonies. This letter to Mr. Cardwell was, of course, a private one, and it was deemed of such importance that Mr. Cardwell forwarded it to the Governor here, and it soon found its way into the Kingston newspapers. How it got there I do not know; but I most positively assert it was not sent to any paper by a Baptist missionary. No sooner, however, did it appear, than the Kingston press assailed it in such a way as to satisfy us that the old slave spirit was still alive. The Guardian, more than any other paper, denounced it as untruthful, and began to write against the Baptist missionaries and Dr. Underhill in such a way as to lead most thoughtful people to fear that the editor of that paper had been bitten by a mad dog. The people knew that in Dr. Underhill they had a friend, and, provoked to think that statements so truthful as he had made should be contradicted, requisitions were forwarded to most of the Custodes asking that meetings might be held to discuss the different subjects referred to in the letter. With these requests most of the Custodes at once complied, and in some instances were wise enough to preside over the meetings. The Kingston papers—the Guardian especially—are now trying to show that these meetings were Baptist meetings. A reference, however, to the resolutions, which in all cases were published, will show that persons of all denominations and of all colours attended at and took part in these meetings, and confirmed the truthfulness of Dr. Underhill's statements.

Soon after the publication of Dr. Underhill's letter in the Guardian—for it was, to the best of my belief, that paper which first printed it—a few poor people in St. Ann's got up a memorial to Mr. Cardwell, the nature of which no one here knows, except from the reply sent to our Governor by Mr. Cardwell. That reply showed that Mr. Cardwell knew nothing whatever of our condition. It, however, suited our Governor, who immediately had it printed and circulated in thousands throughout the length and breadth of the land. It was headed thus: "The Queen's Advice to the Peasantry of Jamaica." The advice it contained was per se excellent, and such as the people had been accustomed to receive from all the Dissenting ministers in the island ever since freedom; but coming at the time it did, and uttering not a word of sympathy for the people in their suffering, and holding out no hope of amelioration, it produced an amount of irritation and ill-will towards the Governor that was most painful to witness. I have very little doubt that if an inquiry take place it will be found that this document was the immediate cause of the outbreak. No sooner had the people read it than they felt all hope of relief from home had departed. From that time the Governor was regarded as their enemy, and as the papers took care to inform the public that the Custodes had sent home accounts utterly opposed to the statements of Dr. Underhill, a large amount of ill-will was evoked towards them and other officials.

Of course I cannot say a word in justification of those who appeared in arms against constituted authority, but I have no hesitancy in declaring that had the people been treated with consideration and kindness the outbreak would not have occurred. Nothing will convince the unkind feeling entertained towards people more than the way in which their property have been treated since a law has been proclaimed. I would gladly, I feel it consistent with my duty, get away from the country, but it would seem cowardly to leave the people in their trouble. There must now be an inquiry into the course of legislation since freedom. An inquiry, if properly conducted, will show the people have been subjected to an amount of injustice of which few people in England are aware. I hope, amongst other things, it will be seen that we are not fit for self-government. Our House of Assembly—our curse—at present powers should be suspended for at least ten years, for in the nature of things it must be worse instead of better. The masses of people are not fit to exercise the franchise if they were, there are no persons willing to enter the House of Assembly qualified to govern them.

Our present Governor is altogether unfit for the post he fills. He has made enemies of every class in the colony. He is, I believe, a good man, but was never intended for a Governor. His conduct is mean and petty, and every thing he does has the effect of irritating some class or other. He makes resolutions and publishes them, and almost before the ink is dry he alters his mind and breaks them. We owe our present misery to the course of policy which he has adopted. Under his rule every thing seems to have got out of order. His rule should be speedy, for no one, either planter, merchant, or peasant, has the least confidence in him.

I cannot write more, as the packet will be going away. . . . It is impossible to say what turn things will take. All manner of rumours are in circulation. The Governor declares the rebellion, as he terms it, has been suppressed. But according to others it will break out in other parts. — and myself and many, are implicated, and will be arrested. I believe the Governor would like to have us in his power. But I must not write thus. My letter will, I dare say, be opened. . . . It is sad and mournful. God seems to be angry with us, and well He may be. Pray for us that we may have the wisdom which cometh from above, and do that and only that which whom we serve and love shall approve.

Governor Eyre, writing to the Home Government, describes the outbreak as "in a great degree due to Dr. Underhill's letter," referred to above. Dr. Underhill writes to the Times that the publication of his letter in Jamaica was not his doing. In January last he addressed a letter to the Colonial Secretary on the state of the island. Mr. Cardwell thanked him for the communication, and sent it to the Governor of Ja

My letter was published by Governor Eyre in the Island Gazette. . . . He it was who "propagated" in Jamaica "those untruthful statements and inuendoes" which he says my letter contains, but which, on a suitable occasion, I am prepared to justify. He it was who gave them the publicity they acquired. My letter was not addressed to the people of Jamaica, but to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and for its publication and the effects consequent upon it, I must disclaim the responsibility which Governor Eyre wishes to fasten upon me. The responsibility is his, not mine.

The letter, which occupied nearly a column of close print in the Times, asks Mr. Cardwell's consideration of the present state of the island of Jamaica. Crime has frightfully increased, the prisons being filled with persons charged with larceny, arising from the extreme poverty of the people. They were starving, there being neither work nor capital to employ them. The sugar cultivation employs only 30,000, leaving 340,000, of whom at least 130,000 are adults, entirely dependent on the provisions grown on their little freeholds. If provisions fail they must steal or starve. The letter proceeds :—

I shall say nothing of the course taken by the Jamaica Legislature ; of their abortive Immigration Bills ; of their unjust taxation of the coloured population ; of their refusal of just tribunals ; of their denial of political rights to the emancipated negroes. Could the people find remunerative employment, these evils would in time be remedied, from their growing strength and intelligence. The worst evil consequent on the proceedings of the Legislature is the distrust awakened in the minds of capitalists, and the avoidance of Jamaica, with its manifold advantages, by all who possess the means to benefit it by their expenditure.

Unless means can be found to encourage the outlay of capital in Jamaica in the growth of those numerous products which can be profitably exported, so that employment can be given to its starving people, I see no other result than the entire failure of the island, and the destruction of the hopes that the Legislature and the people of Great Britain have cherished with regard to the well-being of its emancipated population.

Dr. Underhill concludes by offering two or three suggestions to avoid so painful a result. Further information upon this painful subject will be found in our "Home Intelligence" and "Retrospect."

AMERICA.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.

New York, November 7, 1865.

The late meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, held at Chicago, October 3—6, was one of deep, though not of exciting, interest. The place where the meeting was held could not but suggest most inspiring thoughts to an American Society engaged in foreign missions. Ten years after this Board was organised, Chicago was a village of ten houses, with a population of about fifty souls. It has now a population of 178,000 ; 65,000 of these—that is, more than one-third—have been added within the last four years. Out of this city and the surrounding country the sessions of the Board gathered a daily congregation of about 2,000 persons. Among these the members of the Board were remarkable by their very aspect. It was said that so many grey-headed men were never before seen together at the West.

The spirit of the meeting was exceedingly hopeful ; and the Western men took the lead in expressing it. The termination of the war, the restoration of the Union, the sudden return of the whole energy of the nation to peaceful and productive occupations, the evident intervention of God in behalf of the cause of freedom and righteousness, and the grateful sense of His great goodness, prepared them to see and to describe in the most striking aspect the obligation of America to consecrate herself to the great work of evangelising the world. There could not have been a happier or more significant conjunction than that of the young vigour, and wealth, and hopefulness of the boundless West, and the disciplined wisdom and piety of the East in this recent enthusiastic council of the friends of missions at Chicago.

I have already informed you of the successful close of the Board's financial year. Some of the circumstances connected with that result will be interesting to the readers of Christendom. The statement which I quote was made by the Rev. Dr. Treat, one of the Secretaries of the Board :—

The Board will suppose that there was some anxiety in my mind in the month of August, when I tell them that when I went to the office on the morning of the 28th of August we needed 70,000 dollars to complete the 135,000 dollars. You will not think it strange that, if not discouraged, I was extremely solicitous. But, I thought, this will be a good day for contributions. The treasurer opened the letters, and they were not large, and up to the hour when I went home to dinner he had received but two or three thousand dollars ; certainly, on that day and at that time, a most unfavourable prospect. I missionary was able to erect such an edifice at his station, with foreign funds, they wonder, and perhaps murmur that he does not, from the same exhaustless wealth, do the like for them. It is then desirable, at least in the earlier stages of a mission, that missionaries have primary regard to native tastes, and wants, and impressions.

The following very compact statistical statement may be interesting: The total number of missions is 20; of stations, 104; of out-stations, 248. Number of missionaries, teachers, and helpers employed, 1,103; number of churches, 180; church members, 23,338; number of schools, 369; number of pupils, 10,722.

But a statement of Dr. Treat will be more interesting by far than naked figures. He said: "It is found by careful comparison that the number of persons actually received into mission churches and the churches in Massachusetts for twenty-five years is very nearly the same. From a careful calculation it is found to be so—yet the missionaries have been but 150, and the ministers of Massachusetts have been 405, so that for twenty-five years missions have had greater success than the churches in Massachusetts almost as three to one. I suppose we are hardly prepared to admit that Christianity is a failure in Massachusetts." You will not wonder that the whole meeting was exceedingly delightful, and that its impression upon those who were present, and upon the cause, has been very encouraging.

Sydney, N.S.W., Sept., 1865.

The long-sought union of Presbyterian Churches has at length been consummated; and having, from time to time, sent you notices of the progress of the movement, I feel bound to furnish an account of the happy result. At the conference held in June all preliminaries were definitely settled, and the separate synods assembled in Sydney on the 6th September, to wind up their affairs, and to prepare their last act and declaration, so as to advance with due regularity up to the moment of their merging in one body.

On Friday, the 8th September, the public consummation of the union of the Presbyterian churches in New South Wales took place in the Masonic Hall. At eleven o'clock the members of the Synod of Australia arrived from St. Andrew's Church, and the members of the General Synod from the Free Church, Macquarie-street, and the Rev. Adam Thomson and several members of his congregation from the Philip-street Church. The members of the Synod of Australia took their places on the right of the chair; the members of the General Synod on the left, the two moderators sitting in front of the chair. The Rev. Adam Thomson, as clerk of the conference, took his place between the moderators.

The Rev. Dr. Fullerton, Moderator of the Synod of Australia, commenced the proceedings by giving out the 100th Psalm, "All people that on earth do dwell." The Rev. A. C. Geikie, Moderator of the General Synod, then offered prayer. The Rev. Dr. Fullerton then called on the Rev. John McGibbon, clerk of the Synod of Australia, who read the "last act and declaration" of that synod, which, after reference to the union negotiations now brought to a successful termination, states that "this synod is of opinion that it is for the glory of God and the good of the Church of Christ that the union of the aforesaid parties should not be longer delayed," and accordingly agrees to consummate the union.

The Rev. A. C. Geikie then called on the Rev. James Cameron, clerk of the General Synod, who read the last act and declaration of that synod, couched in similar terms to that of the Synod of Australia.

The Rev. A. Thomson then called on Mr. McNaughten, clerk of the Kirk Session of the United Presbyterian Church, Philip-street, who read a declaration of similar purport from that session.

The Rev. Adam Thomson, as clerk of the conference, then read the articles formerly agreed upon as the basis of the union. During the reading of these articles, all the members of the three several bodies about to unite remained standing, and as each article was concluded every member held up his right hand in token of assent thereto.

The Rev. Dr. Fullerton then read the following declaration:—

I, James Fullerton, Moderator of the Synod of Australia in connexion with the Established Church of Scotland, do hereby, in terms of the act and declaration now read by the clerk of synod, declare that the ecclesiastical connexion of said synod with the Established Church of Scotland is henceforth dissolved. And I do now, in terms of the same act and declaration, and also in terms of the articles of basis of union, just raise some conflict of physical force. The press has said much about the fiendish proceedings of the negroes at Morant Bay, and many might be led to exclaim, 'Can they be human beings? Missionaries, not of our denomination, have been openly charged with being implicated in that rising. When Jamaica is displayed as a specimen of a country under negro ascendancy, as the pet and model government of philanthropists and missionaries, and the events themselves are distorted to serve the cause of colour-antipathy and anti-missionary prejudices—though averse to strife and ourselves unnamed, we are neither slow nor sorry, under such circumstances, to meet our opponents and argue out the matter. Now, the three questions which naturally arise are: First, does this rising prove that the negro is not human flesh and blood? Secondly, does the mode of its suppression prove that the West Indian white in point of morals stands so very much higher than the negro? And, thirdly, do its predisposing causes and immediate occasion testify that English honour is safe, or negro rights protected, when left to the care of ex-slaveowners, their agents and disciples? I ask, then, does the rising prove that the negro is not human flesh and blood? At a railway station the other day, I heard a gentleman exclaim, upon laying down the newspaper, "They cannot be human." Why are they not? On Saturday a number of them had to appear at the petty sessions held at Morant Bay to vindicate their title to land which they had long occupied against an unexpected claimant. Some of them believed, probably wrongly, that the magistrates on the bench were their enemies and oppressors, and they consequently murmured. One of their number was upon that ordered into custody, and he was instantly rescued. Did human beings never do the like? On Monday, warrants were issued for twenty-eight of them to be apprehended; but when the police went to serve them they were sent back without their prisoners, being first sworn not to take action against them. Did human beings in England, Scotland, or Ireland never do the like? On Wednesday six hundred approached the court-house, when they found that the volunteers had been called under arms, and they were ordered to a distance, and the Riot Act was read; but they did not depart. Well! did human beings never act so? The crowd consisted of black men and women; upon the volunteers firing upon them, some fell dead, and the living rushed, some upon their assailants and some to the barracks for arms. Was that a course never taken by human beings? After the Volunteers had thus shot many, they in their turn retreated into the court-house, when their assailants, being unable to get at them, set fire to the house. It was most horrible; but did never human beings do the like? In France, in 1848, did not my own eyes see the Château d'Eu, where the only detachment that stood faithful to Louis Philippe was, not burned out by fire, but burned in the house, by a blaze made of the King's carriages? and yet these Parisians are of the most civilised type of the human race, and these rioters of Morant Bay of baser blood! But after the volunteers were unhoused, did they not wreak upon them horrible vengeance? Yes, but we have only what their enemies say. What these men had to say in their own defence, good care was taken that it should be heard only at a higher tribunal. Governor Eyre commits himself to one thing. He states the fact of sixteen volunteers being killed; but as to the cutting out of tongues, scooping out eyes, burnings, and roastings, he places this under the formula "it is said," thereby taking care not to commit himself. Many of us know that a great number of the acts of fiendish cruelty attributed to the natives in the Indian mutiny, which fired us all, and made one journal roar for blood till every paper on the Continent cried shame, were never committed, except in the newspapers. The truth was bad enough, but panic fear and panic fury, together with the spirit of lying, made it ten times worse. As it was so in India, why should it not be so in this case? The most horrible statement of all, that brains had been mixed with rum and drunk, Governor Eyre does not even allude to. But had the worst said by Jamaica papers been true, would it prove that negroes were not of human kind? Do not the state of Albania, the story of cannibalism about a year ago from the groves of Magna Græcia, the annals of queenly Rome, the records of every age, and the tongues of every race, proclaim that it is of human nature when enraged to do red and ghastly deeds? Call the murderers of Morant Bay savage, brutal, fiendish beings, and every good man will echo it, especially to the face of their friends and brethren; but say that the blood of the white race never burns to that excess, and every honest man will part from you. By every history you tell not the truth. Although we belong not all to one race, we are all born in sin; and "desperately wicked" is as true of the hearts that beat under the fair skin of my fathers as of that under the dusky skin of Paul Bogle. When the powerful revile the mean, the place of a Christian is beside him with whom he will share reproach, not praise. Secondly, Sir, does the mode of suppressing this riot prove that the West Indian whites in point of morals stand very much higher than the negroes? On Wednesday Governor Eyre received a letter from the Custos of St. Thomas-in-the-East, intimating that serious disturbances were apprehended, and asking for a supply of troops. On Thursday the news was of an actual collision. On the Friday the Governor himself landed at Morant Bay, and upon ascertaining that some of the rebels were in the immediate vicinity of their camp he sent out a party to capture them. Where? In their forts? No. In their stockades, in their mountain fortresses? No. In their huts? Yes. And whom did they find? Two men and some women. One man was hanged; the other, a youth, was flogged, and the women were set free. Here I would observe that the Governor himself admits that no violence had been done by the rioters to women or children. He also says there was no organisation, mentions no fighting but at the first rush—no armed resistance to the troops—never saw a hostile formation, battalion, company, or squad. He gives no hint of general butcheries in cold blood by negroes. One collision only is mentioned, wherein the assailants were overpowered by the blacks, and sixteen murdered—some, perhaps, brutally mutilated; but new settlers, and persons not obnoxious, are spared, women and children respected. The official account shows alleged that their wages were kept back for weeks together, their time fraudulently reckoned, terms of agreement broken, and they could not carry their complaint before any bench where sat magistrates directly responsible to and dependent on the Crown, only those of the planter class—would not the labour market of your country drift into an odd position? And would you turn round and blame the Baptists? The facts are enough to account for misery enough to destroy confidence between the people and those above them. The power of the Home Government has always been exerted on the side of right—it has vetoed many intended doings; but, alas for Jamaica, to the island authorities have been left the powers of legislating and administering! Negroes masters there! missionaries ascendant! education better provided for than at home! The old spirit of the slavers has found a body to inhabit in high places, else such mis-statements could not find influential utterance. In this moment of reproach for the black we must stand by him. Where he has done wrong let us not extenuate it; where he is idle, licentious, or cruel, let us call his sins by the right name, and urge him to repent. But by every principle of manly Christian truth, let us face the people that say these faults belong to his race, and not others. Man for man, the Jamaica blacks will not shrink from comparison with the whites. As to barbarous cruelty, it is for future investigation to show who has most cause this day to blush—Saxon or negro. One thing is plain—the experience of many years shows that English honour and negro rights are both unsafe in the keeping of authorities grown from the slave-owning class. The beneficent power of the Crown must at least provide for the poor a magistracy above suspicion. I do not say, for I do not know, that the suspicions of unfairness entertained by the labourers were justified. I do say they were natural, and ought to be forestalled by other appointments.

RELIGIOUS WORSHIP IN THE METROPOLIS.

The Nonconformist has been at the pains to collect some valuable and important statistics on the present amount of church and chapel accommodation for the inhabitants of London, and to compare them with the results obtained in the census of 1851. In his introductory remarks the editor is careful to explain that his figures are devoid of official authority, and must be taken for what they are worth. At the same time, he states the process adopted to secure fairness and accuracy, which appear to us to be all that a private compiler could do to avoid mistakes and present a true and honest result. As some suspicion may be felt by Churchmen that the Nonconformist would not have the means, even if it had the inclination, to do justice to the efforts made by the Established Church, we think it right to mention, that the editor explains he has obtained his figures on this branch of his subject from the Bishops of London and Winchester, and from the secretaries to the Church Building Funds begun by those prelates, and he gratefully acknowledges the courtesy and liberality with which all the information available for his purpose was freely placed at his disposal. There appears, therefore, to be no reason to doubt the general accuracy of his tables; and though a critical eye, versed in the accommodation of particular localities, or perhaps adopting a different mode of classification in the denominations, might challenge his statements here and there, yet these would not affect the general result.

It appears, then, from these tables, that 219 new places of worship have been built in London since the census of 1851, affording accommodation for 219,346 persons. Of these the Established Church has built 95, giving accommodation for 102,233; while all other bodies have built 124, giving accommodation to 117,113. It will thus be seen that the non-established bodies, among which, we repeat, all sects are included, have provided more accommodation than the Established Church. The difference would be diminished, though it would not disappear, if the orthodox denominations alone were reckoned. Among Dissenters, the greatest increase has taken place among the Baptists, and next among the Congregationalists. The number of Wesleyan churches appears to have fallen off, but the new churches erected must be of larger size, for there is an increase in their accommodation to the extent of 8,292 sittings.

But while church accommodation has been increased, the population has been growing in a still larger proportion. There has been an increase during the last fifteen years to the extent of 653,258 souls, and the important question is whether the increase in the church accommodation has kept pace with the growth of the population. On this point the report presents a discouraging view. Far from having met the wants of the present day, we have not yet supplied the deficiencies of past times. According to the calculation of Mr. Horace Mann, in his well-known religious census of 1851, fifty-eight per cent. of the population, which was the largest number that could possibly be in church at one time, is the scale by which to measure the deficiency of religious instruction. Tried by this test, the accommodation provided for London in 1851 was very defective, for there was only accommodation for thirty and the merest fraction per cent. And now, after fifteen years of effort, we have scarcely been able to hold our own, for the return of accom-days. The Chairman selected as the subject of his introductory address, "Parental Duty and Responsibility." He pointed out the intimate relations between domestic piety and church prosperity, dwelt strongly on the perils of the spirit of increasing worldly conformity, and threw out valuable hints as to the mode in which existing tendencies may be counteracted. The address produced a very deep impression. Mr. Alfred Rooker, of Plymouth, read a paper on "The Qualification and Office of Deacon." Among the other papers read was one by Mr. Charles Reed, on "Sunday-schools," and Mr. John Crossley on "Middle-class Education." These led to the adoption of a resolution to convene a special conference in London fully to consider the subject. One of the most interesting features in the proceedings was the reception, in a densely-crowded public meeting, of Drs. Raleigh and Vaughan, the deputation from the Union to the National Council of American Congregationalists. Both those gentlemen gave an account of their mission, and subsequently received a vote of thanks. The assembly, at one of the meetings for conference, after listening to the Rev. Dr. Storrs, an American minister, pleading earnestly for help to the freed slaves, resolved to give a collection on the second Sunday in January in all their churches in support of this object. Several papers and reports were read on the denominational literature of the body, and various proposals were made with a view to increase the circulation of its newspapers and periodicals, which were adopted. The Rev. J. H. Wilson stated, on this subject, that the number of weekly and monthly magazines issued in England had increased from 600,000 to 6,900,000 per annum since 1831; and the number of newspapers from 38,648,000 to 546,000,000 in the same period, but denominational literature had not increased. What was deemed the most important subject brought before the assembly, however, was that in connexion with a report from the Bicentenary Committee, from which it appeared that a site had been obtained for a Memorial-hall in Cannon-street and Bow-lane, which would also have a frontage to the new street from Blackfriars-bridge to the Mansion House. The cost of the site (freehold), with the purchase of the lease of one of the proprietors, and other expenses, would amount to 50,000*l.* It was estimated by the committee that 20,000*l.* more would be required to erect such a hall as would enable the Union to concentrate all its offices under one roof, and hold all its meetings in one place. Mr.

John Remington Mills, M.P., strongly urged the importance of this movement, and offered 10,000*l.*, if four other gentlemen would give 5,000*l.* each. Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., at once agreed to be one of the four, and Mr. John Crossley another, and this, with 10,000*l.* previously subscribed, would make 30,000*l.* of the required amount. It was resolved that special efforts should be made to carry the project into effect.

DR. KRUMMACHER AND THE PERSECUTIONS IN SAXONY.

Dr. Schmettau having called the attention of Dr. Krummacher, of Potsdam, to the mention of his name at the late meeting of the Baptist Union at Bradford, in connexion with the case of persecution of Baptists in the kingdom of Saxony, has received the following unequivocal reply. We regret that this should be the second occasion on which Dr. Schmettau has found it necessary to remove hasty and unfounded accusations against his eminent friend:—

My Dear Brother Schmettau,—Your communication regarding the transactions of the Baptist Union at Bradford has greatly surprised me. To stamp me as an advocate or even the instigator of the persecutions of Baptist brethren, and, moreover, in the kingdom of Saxony! I have had to suffer during my life many misrepresentations and attacks, but never one worse or more unfounded than this. However, I think I can surmise the possible origin of the statement, as I remember having in an address at Geneva expressed my regret that the Baptist brethren here and there too boldly provoked the Established Churches against themselves by publicly marking them with the invidious appellation of "Babel," and I took occasion, kindly and in brotherly love, to ask them to desist from such conduct. But this has been my whole crime. At all times I have declared myself against all kinds of persecution, and in favour of granting to all liberty of worship and of doctrine. Yea, I have often commended and praised them for their firm attachment to the Holy Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, as the Word of God in its fulness and entirety, also for their moral and spiritual earnestness, and their Church discipline; at the same time I could not approve of their unmeasured proselytising zeal, in which many of them in Germany, differing on this point from their brethren in Great Britain and North America, go beyond the limits of Christian propriety and wisdom. But never have I denied my brotherly love to them, and my heart beats higher when I think of men like Mr. Baptist Noel, Dr. Steane, and so many others among them, as my fellow-labourers for Christ.

Pray present to them my hearty brotherly salutation, and with the same greeting I commend you and your house to the Lord and His grace.—Yours affectionately, and favoured a profitable and harmonious season. Such subjects were discussed as, "Improvement of Village Schools," "Report on Benevolence, and Methods of Increasing it," "How shall we best Promote the Spiritual Welfare of the Children of our Villages," "How can we Promote True Revivals," and "By what Means can we Revive the Decaying Missionary Spirit." Good essays were first read on these topics, discussion followed, and then each in its turn was referred to a committee, who presented resolutions, that were discussed, revised, and adopted. One evening was given to reminiscences of Mr. Rhea, and it was an affecting occasion, never to be forgotten. We look hopefully to a reviving of our work, fresh consecration of Christians to Christ, and an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon us.

F. W. KRUMMACHER.

Potsdam, Berlin, Nov. 9, 1866.

In replying to a letter addressed to Mr. Rhea, Dr. Perkins, after that gentleman's death, writes to the Foreign Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance:—

We would thank you and your committee most sincerely for your renewed exertions in behalf of this suffering people; and are profoundly grateful to your Government for its kind disposition in the same direction. I think that your Ambassador in Persia, thus instructed, is heartily desirous to carry out those benevolent wishes of your Government, so far as he finds it practicable to do so. It is not an easy matter to deal with officials, so utterly unprincipled and reckless of the welfare of the subjects of the country as are the mass of Persian officials.

In regard to our missionary work, while the Persian Government professes to find no fault with us personally, nor with our missionary labours in their details, it is still very wakefully jealous of everything savouring of Protestantism in this despotic Mohammedan empire, not concealing its conviction, that wherever Protestantism takes root, there is in the same degree light and freedom of thought—a compliment to our holy religion, our enemies themselves being judges. The same Government, unable to find any plausible pretext for openly assailing us, is still determined to circumscribe and embarrass our work in every way in its power. We will still rely, first, on the good hand of the Lord, which has so long been over us in mercy; and next, on the friendly offices of British representatives in Persia, as God's instruments, to whom we have been so long under unspeakable obligation for our personal security and protection in the quiet prosecution of our work.

You may have been informed that the malevolent Persian Agent for the Nestorians, Meerza Nejef Ali, who so sorely oppressed them, has been removed from his place for the time, at the instance of your Ambassador. We hope that he will not be sent back, and that no other Persian will be appointed to occupy the place, for it would only add to the heavy burdens of the Nestorians.

We thank you for the copy of your circular, indicating subjects for the week of prayer in 1866. That concert has become a precious means of grace to the Nestorians, the return of which is anticipated by them with deep and general interest. Your last circular will be immediately translated into their language and circulated.

INDIA.

Great sensation has been created in Jubbulpore by the baptism of a Mohammedan Soofee and his friend, a village schoolmaster, who had become enlightened by his instrumentality. At a meeting of respectable Mussulmans, some of them declared that, after what the Soofee had done, it behoved them also to inquire whether these things were so. More recently a third convert, also the result of the inquiries and earnestness of the first, has been baptized.

From the Nagpore mission of the Free Church of Scotland the baptism of three adults and three children is reported. A native preacher thus contrasts the present state of things with that which prevailed twenty years ago:—

Nagpore is not the Nagpore of 1845, when the first missionary arrived here. The days of strong prejudices have nearly vanished. Some time ago many proud Brahmins had to undergo bathings on a mere touch of a European, who was reckoned a low caste (Mlecha). Even European clothes were considered polluting, but now thousands flock to the bungalows, and converse freely with Europeans; defilement by touch and such other trifling ideas have ceased. Mahars (low castes) and Brahmins are equally arraigned before the bar of the court. Doors of usefulness of all kinds, and especially to the Christian ministry, are opened widely. Ignorance is still at its height, though people of late begin to appreciate the value of education. Our schools are crowded, and sit daily under the influence of the Gospel.

CHINA.

The English Presbyterian mission has been compelled to abandon, for the present, the work they had commenced in Tai-wan-foo, the capital of Formosa. One Lord's-day, as the missionaries were about to conduct Divine service, an excited mob attacked their house, and threatened them with violence. The mandarin of the district was appealed to, but he declared himself unable to control the populace, and told the missionaries they must leave. This they were compelled to do, and they are now at Takao, another important centre in Formosa, engaged in preaching and healing. They fully expect that, ere long, they will be able to re-occupy the capital.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The United Presbyterian missionaries in Kaffraria have been solicited by the natives to extend their operations, and occupy new ground. The Transkeian Territory has lately been given by the British Governor to the Fingoes and the paramount chief of the Kaffirs.

Literature.

Glasgow: Collins. London: Wesley.

THIS substantial work is in three volumes, and contains not only the Scripture text with parallel references and marginal renderings, but a somewhat copious critical and explanatory commentary. In addition, it includes introductions to the several books, sundry tables of miscellaneous matter, several maps, and about twelve full-page chromo-lithographs, beautifully printed from photographic views of scenes in the Holy Land. The first volume, extending from Genesis to Esther, bears the name of Dr. Robert Jamieson, of Glasgow. The second volume, from Job to Malachi, is by the Rev. A. R. Fausset, of York, and the Rev. B. M. Smith. The third volume, comprising the New Testament, is edited by Dr. Brown, of Aberdeen, and Mr. Fausset.

Of the preliminary, supplementary, and illustrative matter in general, we have little to say, except in commendation. The plan of Jerusalem, however, is hopelessly inaccurate, and the map to illustrate the New Testament is very inferior. Some of the tables should have been revised more carefully, and that of kindred and affinity has no claim to a place at all. The printing in general appears to have been carefully done, although errors have here and there crept in. The expositors have shown much zeal and industry, and if their respective contributions are not all of equal merit, they have yet produced a work of much value. Some of the earlier portions are to us least satisfactory, from a critical aspect. Speaking doctrinally, practically, and to a great extent critically, the work is one of extraordinary merit and utility as a work for the million. It is a most praiseworthy attempt to bring the wisdom of the learned within the reach of ordinary readers, and may be safely recommended to all.

from American Poets. The Religious Tract Society.

THIS is no mere reprint of a transatlantic work. The hymns of which it is composed have been for the most part selected by the British editor, and a brief introduction from an English pen presents a lively sketch of early American poetry. The reader is told most truly that it was not "till after the independence of the United States had been secured that her writers displayed originality of thought, correctness of diction, or beauty of style;" and some specimens of versification from the early colonists serve, in some degree, to confirm that statement. Hence all the pieces in the volume before us are by writers who have flourished since the revolution, and most of them by those of the present generation, or that immediately preceding it. Many English readers will be surprised at the richness of the collection. Though some of the finest compositions bear well-known names, such as those of Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Mrs. Sigourney, Longfellow, and Ray Palmer, the greater number of the whole are by authors almost or wholly unknown to the British public. They are evidence at once of the piety and the literary culture of a large section of that great nation whom Englishmen should ever feel gratified to remember as their kinsmen, with whom they are identified on all the greatest questions that can interest humanity. The volume is got up in a handsome style.

Commentary on the Gospel of St. John. By E. W. HENGSTENBERG, D.D. From the German. Vol. 2. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

AUTHORS of "Essays and Reviews," and of works in which the books of the Bible are "critically examined," or in which history and biography are written from a "subjective" point of view, may look with no small apprehension on the ever-growing "Foreign Theological Library." But knowing, as we do, how strong an infusion of German ideas is mixed up with recent English assaults upon the faith, we the more rejoice to receive the antidote from German sources too. The great learning and talent, the long experience, and the Christian earnestness of Dr. Hengstenberg, point him out as the right sort of man to give us a commentary upon the fourth Gospel. The book was wanted on many accounts, and not least because John's Gospel has of late been the object of special hostility. The two volumes of the commentary together extend over nearly eleven hundred pages octavo. We have mentioned the author's learning, and we are quite sure that we may commend the way in which he uses it. Some of his countrymen write books the pages of which bristle with Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and look like a very jungle of erudition; but Dr. Hengstenberg is too earnestly set upon the profit of his readers for small work of this kind, and with as much learning as most, he happily avoids the excessive display of it which some delight in. The work seems to be very well translated, and it is got up in a superior style.

Thoughts at Seventy-nine. By the Author of "Thoughts on Devotion," &c. Jackson, Wal-ford, and Hodder.

A VOLUME of essays, reflections, and metrical compositions, all more or less of a devotional, religious, or ethical kind. The meditative piety, calmness and sobriety of judgment, and ripened experience, by which they are pervaded, well accord with the indication of the author's years

FOREIGN.

THOUGH the civil war has ceased in America, the state of things there is far from becoming settled. The conflict of parties which existed before the war began has revived with as much bitterness as ever, now that it is finished, and upon issues that are entirely new. The struggle now lies between the Democrats and the Republicans, which latter again are divided, like our own Liberal party, into Moderates and Radicals, and it happens that in the annual election of members to Congress, this latter section of the Republicans has carried nearly all the States that in the time of war stood firm for the Union. We are loth to believe all the uses to which their opponents say the victors mean to put their success. While the canvass was continued, it must be understood that all three parties professed to support the policy of the President, which it is well known was to restore State rights to the conquered South as soon as the different States abolished slavery, and repudiated the Confederate debt; on these conditions it is understood the Democrats and the Moderate Republicans are willing to admit the delegates from the South into the Union, leaving the State Legislatures to deal with the more intricate questions of negro suffrage, and similar points. But the Radicals are not disposed to let the South off so easily; they insist on taking securities that the negro shall be elevated to the franchise; and it is added, though we will not believe it without more evidence than is yet forthcoming, that they propose to confiscate the estates of the leading Secessionists for the benefit of Northern settlers. But whether this be their ulterior object, or whether they only wish to keep the South out of the Union till more secure guarantees be taken for the protection of the negro, they are sure to come into collision with the views of the President, whose declared object is to rehabilitate the Union with as much speed as possible, and as nearly as possible in its original condition. It will be a new and a curious experiment on the complex machinery of the United States constitution to see whether the President or the majority in the Congress will prove the strongest in the encounter. Another difficulty arising out of the Constitution delays, it is said, the trial of Jefferson Davis. The President wishes him to be tried before the Supreme Court at Washington, where, undoubtedly, he would have a fair and impartial trial. But then his crime of rebellion was not committed at Washington; it was perpetrated in the State of Virginia, and there, accordingly, his trial ought to be. But it is admitted on all hands that a trial in Virginia would be equivalent to an acquittal, for even a packed jury could hardly be got together in Virginia to declare that the late war was an act of treason, and that its instigators were worthy of death. It is not impossible, therefore, but that he may obtain his pardon. The President would rather have him brought to trial, not that he desires to take his life, but that he may satisfy the people that there is such a crime as treason; and it is obvious that a trial to be followed by an acquittal would be worse than a pardon without any trial at all.

The letter of our correspondent reveals to us a glimpse of that great schism in thought and feeling which exists between the Liberal Roman Catholics and the Jesuits in France, and, we may add, wherever Popery prevails. No man has laboured more earnestly—we need not say with what success—to harmonise freedom of thought and action with the Papal claims than M. de Montalembert; and his reward and that of his coadjutors has been to be rebuked and censured by the Vatican for his pains. He has since maintained a dignified silence; but even silence, it seems, cannot save him from insult. The Monde, that organ of the Jesuit faction, taunts him, M. de Broglie, and other liberal Catholics, with saying nothing on the Pope's late Encyclical, and calls upon them to give their opinions to the world. If these men were to take their detractors at their word, we fancy we should have an indignant protest against the folly that, in its mad attempt to return to the middle ages, is dashing out the life of Catholicism against the irresistible influences of the present age.

The first Italian Parliament in the new capital of Italy has just been opened. Florence was more than usually gay on the occasion, and there was a large attendance of the members. The King spoke with great energy, and seems to have quite abandoned the idea, if he ever entertained it, of yielding to the demands of the Pope. He referred to the late negotiations, and said that he broke them off as soon as he found they were inconsistent with the national honour. He directed the attention of the assembly to the necessity of making in subsequent investigations. However these may end, the outbreak itself is most deplorable. Coming at a time, too, when the position of the negro in America is the most prominent question of the day, the Jamaica insurrection cannot fail to have the most disastrous influence on the condition and prospects of the African race in America.

The political situation of the country remains in the same unsettled state as last month. The Cabinet is still incomplete; and the post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, rendered vacant by the transference of the Earl of Clarendon to the Foreign-office, has not yet been filled up. Some minor changes have been made; among them, Sir Robert Peel has been removed from the post of Irish Secretary, avowedly to gratify the Roman Catholics; but as yet there is no indication of a new policy by changes in the Cabinet. The country is quiet and prosperous, and appears to be in no hurry to press the new Premier to a premature declaration of his opinions, either on the Reform question or any other.

An interesting meeting was lately held at Oxford, on a subject that has been engaging a good deal of attention. The falling off in the numbers of University men who enter into holy orders, and the increasing number who come up from theological colleges with, as some allege, a very imperfect training, have been for some time past, as is well known, a subject of general remark. It appeared to some of the University authorities that these defects might be remedied if Oxford education itself could be rendered more accessible, and the benefits of a thorough University training be secured at less than the ordinary University cost. So the meeting was summoned to consider the propriety of extending the University education to poor students. There was much diversity of opinion at the meeting—whether a new hall should be established, or whether additional accommodation should be provided in the existing colleges; whether the expense of the plan should be met by public subscription or defrayed out of the funds of the colleges and the University; and lastly, whether it should be a strictly theological college, or, like the others, open to all classes and professions. These, and questions like these, were warmly debated, and are to receive further consideration.

For once the astute wire-pullers of the Sunday League have been checkmated. An opportunity, as they deemed it, of advancing their schemes has issued in their signal discomfiture. It has lately been determined to remove the cartoons of Raffaele from Hampton Court Palace, where they have long been exhibited, to a more convenient gallery in the Kensington Museum. Now Hampton Court Palace is open on Sundays, and the Kensington Museum is not. The Sunday League forthwith sent up a deputation to Earl Granville, demanding, in the voice, as they said, of 200,000 workmen in London, that the Kensington Museum should be opened on Sundays; and Earl Granville, speaking for himself, expressed his concurrence with the application. This roused the indignation of the real working men of London, especially those on the south of the river, where most of the great factories are; and, having obtained an interview with Earl Granville, through Mr. Hughes, M.P., they declared their opinion that the opening of museums on the Sabbath would be no boon to men of their order. Mr. Hughes stated that his individual opinion was rather in favour of Sunday opening, but he had been so struck with the earnestness of the working classes among his constituents on this question, that he had been led in some measure to modify his views. Earl Granville announced that there was no intention to open the museums on Sundays, so that Mr. Morrell, Mr. Langley and Co., have taken less than nothing by their motion.

The Roman Catholics of Belfast have lately shown a small, and but a small, spirit of resistance to Episcopal intolerance. There was a Young Men's Catholic Association in the town, which had, by dint of subscriptions, built a hall on a piece of ground they purchased; but otherwise it was in a state of financial atrophy. Their land was, however, wanted for commercial purposes, and they were suddenly enriched by the handsome price they obtained for it. On this, Dr. Dorrian, the Roman Catholic bishop, interposed, and demanded that the surplus should be given up to him to be used for the purposes of the Church. The members of the Institute were good Catholics, but they were still better economists; they believed the money would benefit them more than the bishop would; and a large majority flatly refused. Hereupon ensued a series of high-handed and despotic acts on the part of the bishop; the end of which has been that, though the bishop did not get the money, he broke up the Association, and a new one has been formed, whose main regulation is that the members are in all things to be amenable to his will. It is necessary, however, to every association to have members, and, in the case of this new Roman Catholic Institute, these do not appear to be forthcoming.
